899. Limits of the Rule.—There can be no right of private defence where there is no violation of a legal right. Where a girl who had been previously betrothed to one A was afterwards betrothed to another B, whereupon A eloped with the girl accompanied by two servants. The party were, however, intercepted by C, a party of the girl's father, who seized A's horse to prevent his riding away with the girl, whereupon A and his servants attacked and struck C. It was held that A had no right to attack C, and that the mere fact that he apprehended a general attack upon his party by C did not let in that right.<sup>3</sup> In another case the proved facts of the case disclosed that the accused was in intrigue with one A's wife, who one night left her husband to visit the accused, who was then sleeping 80 paces distant from A's lodging whereupon A understood the purpose of her visit and followed her with a hatchet with which he attacked and wounded the accused, who thereupon stabbed A with a knife in the heart, instantly killing him, for which he was prosecuted for murder. In the original Court he denied his intimacy with A's wife, and all knowledge of the transaction, but on the facts being found against him, he contended on appeal, that even if the facts be found to have been as alleged, his act was justifiable homicide in the exercise of the right of private defence, but it was held that the accused had failed to establish any circumstance establishing the necessity of killing A which it was upon him to do, and that the plea could not be availed of.<sup>4</sup> So where the complainant's party had seized the accused's cattle after they had left their field which they had no right to do, whereupon the accused resisted, killing one of them, it was held that the accused party did not constitute an unlawful assembly, and only the person who had inflicted the mortal wound was liable for it.<sup>5</sup>

100. The right of private defence of the body extends, under the restrictions mentioned in the last preceding section, to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the assailant, if the offence which occasions the exercise of the right be of any of the descriptions hereinafter enumerated :—

First.—Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that death will otherwise be the consequence of such assault ;

Secondly.—Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that grievous hurt will otherwise be the consequence of such assault ;

Thirdly.—An assault with the intention of committing rape ;

Fourthly.—An assault with the intention of gratifying unnatural lust ;

Fifthly.—An assault with the intention of kidnapping or abducting ;

Sixthly.—An assault with the intention of wrongfully confining a person under circumstances which may reasonably cause him to apprehend that he will be unable to have recourse to the public authorities for his release.

900. Analogous Law.—This section is generally in accordance with English Law under which the offences named in the section have been held to offer sufficiently grave provocation so as to justify homicide.

901. Principle.—Homicide is justifiable only upon the plea of necessity, and such necessity only arises in the prevention of forcible and atrocious crimes. This section lays down what is the law in England that a person upon whom a felonious attack is first made is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue the felon till he finds himself out of danger; yet if the felon be killed after he has been properly secured and when the apprehension of danger has ceased, such killing will be murder: though perhaps, if the blood were still hot from the contest or pursuit, it might be held to be only manslaughter on account of the high provocation.<sup>1</sup> This is the rule here enacted. Under the last section two things curtail the defender's right, (i) facility of recourse to the public authorities, and (ii) the rule that the harm caused should be preventive and not punitive. These two rules still apply to this section, as do also the other two restrictions specially made in favour of public servants or others acting under their direction (§ 878). Subject, then, to these four restrictions, a person may even take human life to save human life or liberty or dishonour of the kind which is deemed even as a greater calamity than death.

902. Meaning of Words.—“Voluntary causing of death,” which may moreover be intentional. “Or of any other harm to the assailant”: The word “assailant” would here include also his confederates. If a man is surrounded by two brigands, one of whom deals him a deadly blow and then runs away, leaving the other to finish him, could it be said that his right was only against him who had hit him and run away? “If the offence.....such an assault”: There must be at least an assault before the commencement of the right under this section. “Under circumstances which may cause him to apprehend,” which will depend upon the means of his knowledge, and the manner and nature of his captivity.

903. Justifiable Homicides.—Homicide in self-defence is justifiable under this section subject only to the restrictions contained in the last section. Consequently it may be justifiable irrespective of the fact that the party killing was guilty of an assault, or was engaged in an unlawful contest, provided (i) that the party killing did not either commence or provoke the attack with intent to kill or do grievous bodily harm; (ii) that he declined further conflict, and quitted and retreated from it, so far as was practicable with safety; (iii) that he killed the assailant because he had reasonable cause for believing it to be necessary to do so, in order to avoid immediate death,<sup>2</sup> or the other offences here enumerated. A person who apprehends that his life is in danger or his body in risk of grievous hurt, is entitled to defend it by killing his assailant, but in order to justify his act the apprehension must have been reasonable, and the violence used not more than what was necessary for self-defence.<sup>3</sup> Nor should it be used towards persons unconnected with the assault, actual or threatened.<sup>4</sup>

904. So where the deceased C, who was going on a cart, met one A, whom he asked, “Is that you,” and on his replying in the affirmative he commenced to abuse him and kicked him. The latter (A) then called out to one B, who ran up with a bottle in hand with which he struck C. The latter (C) then slashed A with his dah after which he turned on B and slashed at him with it. The injury caused to A was slight, but the blow given to B cut off three of his fingers. A thereupon took out a knife which he carried and stabbed C in a vital part causing his death, the question was how far his act was justifiable. It was held that although C had turned upon B, A had the right to cause his death if he reasonably apprehended at that time that B's life was in peril owing to the assault by C; that in the circumstances, A might reasonably apprehend that C's conduct indicated an intention on his part to continue using the dah at either of them regardless of the consequences. Indeed, if C had used his dah on B once more, there was the probability of his losing his life, and that under the circumstances A's act in stabbing C was protected by this section.<sup>1</sup>

905. So where a person armed with a heavy weapon rushed at the accused showing every indication of assaulting him, whereupon the latter used his spear as the deceased was in the very act of delivering a blow to him, and which killed him, it was held that, though the accused could have run away, still he was not bound to do so, and that as he reasonably apprehended grievous hurt, he was entitled to use his spear even to the extent of killing his assailant.<sup>2</sup> The same view was taken in another case in which the deceased, a sturdy and dissolute young man, upon a quarrel with the accused who was his uncle and his son, seized the side-post of a cart and raised it to strike the former, whereupon his son seized another side-post two feet long and struck the deceased two blows on the head which killed him; it was held that, as the blow aimed at him by the deceased would certainly have caused grievous hurt and probably death, the accused was within his right in hitting the deceased in the manner he did.<sup>3</sup>

906. In these cases, it will be observed, that the weapons used were such as would have certainly caused grievous hurt, if not death, and where it is so, the question is comparatively a simple one, for all that the accused has then to show is that he had no time to have recourse to the authorities and that the harm caused was under the circumstances not excessive. There may, however, be cases in which it may not be easy to establish that the accused had reasonable apprehension of suffering grievous hurt, as that term is used to denote hurt "which causes the sufferer to be, during the space of twenty days, in severe bodily pain, or unable to follow his ordinary pursuits."<sup>4</sup> Now, how is it always possible for a person to say whether the force of a blow will be such as will disable him for twenty days? Indeed, as Mr. Pyne, a Judge of the Sudder Court, commenting upon this clause remarked that "scarcely any assault could be committed wherein the assailed may not justify an act of homicide under the eighth definition of the offence."<sup>5</sup> It may, however, be added that though the accused may justify his act, it will be for the Court to see if the violence threatened was under the circumstances sufficient to have caused in the mind of the accused a reasonable apprehension of grievous injury. As Straight, J., told the jury in the case of a sergeant who had shot a native, and then pleaded self-defence "that they had to consider two questions, firstly, whether he had a reasonable apprehension that his life or limb was in danger, and secondly, whether the force used was reasonable and such as he believed to be necessary for the purpose of self-defence."<sup>6</sup>

907. The reports furnish several instances of justifiable homicides. In one case, an armed gang set upon the two accused announcing their intention to kill them and shouted: "Din, Din." The accused bolted, but were pursued into the dark kitchen of their friend where they had hidden themselves. The mob broke into the house and two of them made their way with torches to the kitchen where they attacked the accused. The latter delivered a counter-attack, whereupon one of their assailants fled but the other was hacked to death. Their act was held well justified.<sup>7</sup> A person is not bound to abstain from performing a lawful act merely because he is aware that his action would result in a riot. If he is right, woe betide the rioters. The accused were digging a trench. They knew it would provoke a quarrel, which it did. A party attacked the diggers who, being reinforced by their partizans, a free fight ensued in which one of their assailants was killed. One of the accused was himself grievously hurt. They were acquitted.<sup>8</sup>

908. What is a Reasonable Danger.—The question whether in the circumstances of a given case the accused could have had reasonable grounds for apprehending grievous bodily injury is then a question of fact to be decided upon the facts of each case. As the illustration appended to section 300, exception 2, shows, the source of apprehension is not only the kind of weapon used, but the manner of using it. An ordinary piece of rope may be used to cause death, but it depends upon the manner in which it is used. So in a case where the prisoner who had strangled the deceased with a rope said: "We quarrelled about some money I had won from him; he wanted it back, and I would not give it to him; he struck me, and I knocked him down, and kicked him, and then I put a rope round his neck and dragged him into the ditch." Patterson, J., told the jury, "if you believe the prisoner's statement, that will not prevent the crime from being murder, and reduce it to man-slaughter. If two persons fight, and one of them overpowers the other, and knocks him down, and then puts a rope round his neck, and strangles him, that is murder, the act is so wilful and deliberate that nothing can justify it."<sup>1</sup> So again, the relative strength of the combatants is not immaterial. For instance, where a strong man is opposing a weak man, the former may have only a small stick, but the injury it is capable of causing may be very great. Such was the case of a father whose son had been beaten by another boy, and who, thereupon, ran three-quarters of a mile with a small rod,<sup>2</sup> with which he dealt the boy a blow on the head of which he died. It was held to be manslaughter and but for the provocation, it would have been murder.<sup>3</sup>

909. Again the section deals with an exception to the ordinary liability for crime. It must, therefore, be clearly established that the assault sought to be justified was really justifiable under the section; so that it is not enough that an attack had been made upon the accused; he must shew by the nature of the attack, the weapon used, the manner in which it was used, and other circumstances that his case was such that he had reason to apprehend the harm contemplated by the section. The fact that there was in reality such a harm would, of course, strengthen his case, but it is not necessary. For all that accused is called upon to show is, that he believed in its existence, and if the Court is satisfied that he had a reasonable cause for it, he will be held to have established his justification whatever may have been the real facts. Such was the case of one Levet who had killed F F under the following circumstances. F F was a female help engaged by Levet's servant, who opened the door of the house at midnight to let her out. Levet heard the noise and suspecting that thieves had got in, took up a drawn sword and went down in search of them. Hearing Levet's steps, the servant hid F F in the buttery, where Levet's wife espied her and, mistaking her to be a thief, cried out to her husband; whereupon Levet rushed in that direction, thrusting before him with his sword, and so doing mortally wounded F F. It was held to be a misadventure.<sup>4</sup> This finding was justified by Lord Hale on the ground that the ignorance of facts excuses the party from all sorts of blame,<sup>5</sup> and this is also the rule elsewhere enacted in the Code.<sup>6</sup> Where a person pleads the right of self-defence, it is not then necessary to establish the fact conclusively; all that need to be proved is, that he had grounds for believing that violence was attempted and that belief was under the circumstances such as any rational man may have entertained.<sup>7</sup> If he proves this, he is entitled to an acquittal, though it may be shown that he was wholly mistaken in his belief. In short, his belief must be bona fide though it may have been wholly mistaken.

101. If the offence be not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section the right of private defence of the body does not extend to the voluntary causing of death to the assailant, but does extend, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing to the assailant of any harm other than death.

910. Principle.—The result stated in this section naturally follows from the provisions of the last section. If the harm be of the serious description described in the last section, the right extends to the causing of death, otherwise the harm caused may be any harm short of death. But in causing such harm the restrictions laid down in section 99 still apply. Indeed, they are the restrictions which underlie the whole law of self-defence.

911. The offences which justify the causing of harm short of death are only the offences mentioned in section 97. There is no right of private defence against any offence under the Code<sup>1</sup> much less against an act which is an offence only under any special or local law. But this section was held to justify the intentional firing of a gun by a public servant who had been assaulted while making a lawful arrest, which wounded one of the rescuers.<sup>2</sup> Indeed, any hurt short of death caused in self-defence would be justifiable under this section.

912. Excessive Harm.—Law views with commiseration the plight of a person who has exceeded his right of private defence. If it has resulted in death his offence is reduced to one of culpable homicide.<sup>3</sup> Where he is one of five or more, the fact that he has exceeded his right does not convert him into a member of an unlawful assembly, though he would be individually liable for his excess.<sup>4</sup> The case would, however, be different, if the party had initially exceeded that right, or in a case where the exercise of that right was mere pretence.<sup>5</sup> In another case, the accused, a person of education and wealth, living in a town where medical attendance could easily be procured, chained up his brother, who was subject to fits of violent insanity with lucid intervals, for over three months in an unnecessarily cruel way, and apparently would have continued to confine him indefinitely if the District Judge had not interfered. He was held justly convicted under s. 344 and he could not be exculpated under this section or section 92 because he had not acted with due care and attention. In other words, his act lacked good faith.<sup>6</sup> In one case the deceased descended upon the accused, with a pitch fork in his hand, and commenced to abuse his sister whose son attacked him, whereupon the accused struck the deceased on the head, of which he died. The blow was unpremeditated and held to be the result of sudden provocation. He was held to have chastised the deceased with undue severity and was, therefore, convicted of grievous hurt.<sup>7</sup>

102. The right of private defence of the body commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat to commit the offence although the offence may not have been committed; and it continues as long as such apprehension of danger to the body continues.

913. Analogous Law.—This section defines the commencement and continuance of the right of private defence against personal injuries, as section 105 describes the right in protection of property. The two sections are complementary to one another, and have been unnecessarily placed apart. They are both in harmony with the English Law, under which a man may repel force by force in defence of his person, habitation or property, against one who manifestly intends and endeavours, by violence or surprise, to commit a known felony upon either. In these cases, he is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary till he finds himself out of danger ; and if, in a conflict between them, he happens to kill, such killing is justifiable.<sup>1</sup> But it has been held that this rule does not apply to any crime unaccompanied with force, as picking of pockets.<sup>2</sup> It seems, therefore, that the intent to murder, ravish, or commit other felonies attended with force or surprise, should be apparent, and not be left in doubt ; so that if A make an attack upon B, it must plainly appear by the circumstances of the case that the life of B is in imminent danger ; otherwise, his killing the assailant will not be a justifiable self-defence.<sup>3</sup>

914. The word “ offence ” has been used here as meaning an act punishable under the Code.<sup>4</sup>

915. Principle.—On the principle that prevention is better than cure, this section confers upon a person the right of defending himself against both actual as well as threatened dangers. It only postulates that there shall be a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arising from an attempt or threat to commit the offence : the right then comes into existence and continues so long as the danger lasts. It will be noticed that the wording of this section is different from that of section 97. It will be presently considered how far this change of language is material (§ 917).

916. Meaning of Words.—“ Private defence of the body,” that is, of the body of either the defender or any one else. “ Reasonable apprehension of danger,” which must be founded on facts. “ Attempt or threat to commit the offence,” i.e., any offence punishable under the Code.<sup>5</sup> “ Though the offence may not have been committed ” : If committed, the right still exists “ if there is a reasonable apprehension of further danger, but not otherwise, for the object of the right is protective and not punitive.

917. Commencement of the Right of Private Defence.—This section, along with section 105, lays down a very important rule, the existence of which had to be assumed in the previous discussion. The right of defence whether of person or of property depends upon the arising of a reasonable apprehension of danger to person and property.<sup>6</sup> The apprehension must be a reasonable one, for the right does not exist against any belief which a reasonable man would not entertain. It would not, for instance, extend to superstitious fears which a person may entertain of another. So where the accused met the deceased and a third person at a liquor shop, where they all drank together, and then walked in company through a forest when the accused charged the deceased with having caused the death of four of his children by his incantations, which the deceased admitted, and who threatened to have the accused devoured by a tiger before they were out of the forest. Thereupon the accused got frightened and killed the deceased with several blows of a heavy stick. The accused was an ignorant savage and probably did believe in the efficacy of incantations and in the threat to cause his death by their influence. But the fact that the accused believed in them does not make the apprehension a reasonable one, and the accused could not, therefore, justify his act on that ground.<sup>7</sup> Moreover, the section requires that the danger must arise from an attempt or threat to commit the offence which means an act punishable under the Code. Consequently, such a threat could not be avenged, as it would not be an offence under the Code.<sup>8</sup> It is not every idle threat that entitles a man to take up arms. He must pause and reflect whether the threat is intended to be put into execution, and whether the person uttering it had the power to do so.

918. There are many threats which are only used as a form of abuse, but which are never intended to be taken seriously. There are threats which the person uttering them has not the capacity to put into immediate execution. For it is only against a danger, present and imminent, that the right avails. A threat that A shall murder B whenever he gets a chance, does not entitle B to kill A on the spot, for the right of private defence is essentially a protective and not a preventive right. "A bare fear of any of these offences, however well grounded, as that another lies in wait to take away the party's life unaccompanied by any overt act indicative of such an intention, will not warrant him in killing that other by way of precaution, there being no actual danger at the time."<sup>1</sup> The threat of an offence here spoken of must then be understood to mean a threat of present and not prospective danger. It may be that the threat uttered is in itself an offence.<sup>2</sup> Where it is so, the question still remains whether it is a threat of a danger to the body, and causes reasonable apprehension of it. Such apprehension could scarcely arise from the mere threat unaccompanied by any act of preparation. And where the preparation permits a person to have recourse to the authorities, he must apply to them for protection. If, however, he obtains no protection, he is entitled to face the danger, and he has then his right, which he may exercise subject to the restrictions here laid down. It cannot then be said that he could have avoided the danger by running away. Indeed, if a person knows that another is on a road lying in wait for him, he is not bound to avoid it, but may proceed on his way having made preparation to resist the attack with all necessary force which he may resist until he has secured himself from all danger, and in doing so he may pursue his adversary, and even kill him if necessary.<sup>3</sup> So in a case Ford and his party were in possession of a room at a tavern. Several persons persisted in having it, and turning Ford out, but he refused to leave, whereupon they drew their swords upon Ford and his company, and Ford drew his sword and killed one of them. It was held to be justifiable homicide.<sup>4</sup>

919. So in another case, Mawbridge and Cope had some words, whereupon Mawbridge threw a bottle at the head of Cope, and immediately drew his sword. Cope returned a bottle at the head of Mawbridge, whereupon the latter stabbed Cope, and the question was whether Mawbridge was justified, but it was held that he was not, and that his act amounted to murder, because Cope's act in hurling a bottle at Mawbridge was fully justified, as Mawbridge first threw the bottle at Cope and drew his sword, the latter had reason to believe that Mawbridge meant great mischief. Cope's act was, therefore, done in self-defence. And Mawbridge was consequently, guilty of murder, for he had then no justification for stabbing him.<sup>5</sup>

920. It is not always easy to see the dividing line between criminality and non-criminality in such cases. A person may truly believe that his life is in danger; he may consider his belief amply justified, but, in fact, it may not be so. Indeed, when once blood is hot, persons begin to take an exaggerated view of the injury threatened and received, and Law has, consequently, made some allowance for an injury caused in the exercise of the right of self-defence without sufficient grounds. Such cases would be dealt with as arising on a grave and sudden provocation.<sup>6</sup> So if an offender, against whom the right avails, is killed after he has been properly secured or after the apprehension of danger is over, such killing would be murder, though perhaps, if the blood were still hot from the contest or pursuit, it might be held to be only man-slaughter, on account of the high provocation.<sup>7</sup>

921. This raises the question as to how far the right of private defence continues. According to the section the right continues "so long as such apprehension of danger to the body continues." The "such" apprehension means, of course, the reasonable apprehension arising from an attempt or threat to commit the offence. Its continuance must then depend upon the existence of facts which had given rise to the apprehension. If, for instance, the defender fears a renewed attack, his right continues. So where two house-breakers had made an aperture in the accused's tatti wall, and on seeing him come out with a stick one of the men escaped, but the other advanced to attack him, whereupon the latter struck at him in the dark killing him, it was held that the accused had acted within his right.<sup>1</sup> So where a person was mobbed, and the mob entered the cutcherry in which the accused had taken shelter, a person who rushed in and brought out a gun which he fired was held to be justified.<sup>2</sup> But the right does not inure after the affray is over, and after the assailants are running away. If they are pursued, it is revenge and not defence.<sup>3</sup>

922. Again, the right of private defence cannot be availed of by a person to justify his crime. He cannot use force in prosecution of an illegal act. Where, therefore, a man had wrongfully confined some men in a house and killed one of those who attacked it and endeavoured to set it on fire, he was held to be guilty of manslaughter at least.<sup>4</sup>

103. The right of private defence of property extends, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the wrong-doer, if the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right, be an offence of any of the descriptions hereinafter enumerated, namely—

First.—Robbery ;

Secondly.—House-breaking by night ;

Thirdly.—Mischief by fire committed on any building, tent or vessel which building, tent or vessel is used as a human dwelling, or as a place for the custody of property ;

Fourthly.—Theft, mischief or house trespass, under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the consequence, if such right of private defence is not exercised.

923. Analogous Law.—This section is closely analogous to section 100. Indeed, the two sections lay down the same rule, namely, the circumstances in which even the killing of a person is justifiable. Section 100 deals with justifiable homicide in defence of body, while this section deals with justifiable homicide in defence of property. The commentary under this section must, therefore, be read as supplementary to that given under section 100.

924 The rule here laid down is in accordance with the English Law, in which a distinction is observed between such offences as are attended with force, or any extraordinary degree of atrocity which in their nature must be taken of such urgent necessity as will not allow of any delay, and others of a different sort if no resistance be made by the offender.<sup>5</sup> Accordingly it has been held that no one has a right to kill a person found picking his pocket.<sup>6</sup> “But if one pick my pocket and I cannot otherwise take him than by killing him, this falls under the general rule concerning the arresting of felons.”<sup>7</sup>

925. Principle.—This section recognizes the right of a person to kill a person committing offences attended with force or surprise. The offences specified are of this character.

926. Meaning of Words.—“Under the restrictions mentioned in section 99”: Obviously the only restrictions ordinarily applicable are those laid down in paragraphs 3 and 4 of this section. “If the offence which occasions the exercise of the right”: These words are inapt. They only mean if the offences committed and attempted are those described below, and if the circumstances which give rise to the right exist. Such circumstances are described in section 105.

927. Death in Protection of Property.—The circumstances in which a person may lawfully kill another are described in section 100 and this section. The combined effect of the two sections is to authorize the killing of a person in the following cases ;—

If the offender threatens—

- (a) The causing of death or grievous hurt,
- (b) Rape and unnatural offence,
- (c) Kidnapping, abduction and wrongful confinement,
- (d) House-breaking by night or robbery, and
- (e) Arson.

928. The right commences with the reasonable apprehension of danger to person<sup>1</sup> or property.<sup>2</sup> In either case it extends to the causing of death in the five foregoing cases.<sup>3</sup> It ends with the cessation of apprehension of danger,<sup>4</sup> or the recovery of the property, or the obtaining of assistance of the public authorities or the escape of the offender. Now, as regards the right here conferred, two points are essential: (i) The right does not commence till there is a reasonable apprehension,<sup>5</sup> and (ii) that reasonable apprehension must be of the commission of the crimes described in the four clauses. In order then to justify homicide under this section, it is not enough to show that the person slain was a trespasser, or that he had even gone into one's hen roost and some dead fowls and a crow found were near him, for that will not amount to house-breaking or robbery, or an attempt to commit the same.<sup>6</sup> But it will be, of course, different if he had already made an aperture in the wall, and was about to get in through, when he was assaulted.<sup>7</sup> But a mere house-breaking by daytime would not justify the killing of the house-breaker and such is also the law of England,<sup>8</sup> but if the house-breaking is such as imports an apparent robbery, or an intention or attempt of robbery, then the case would be different, and in this respect also the section closely follows the English rule.<sup>9</sup> So where a person was in actual peaceable possession of land upon which he had sown a crop, the act of the accused who came in force to cut the crop was robbery, and the party in possession were entitled to resist it even to the extent of killing the aggressors.<sup>10</sup> And as dacoity is only an aggravated form of robbery,<sup>11</sup> it follows that the same right exists against dacoits as is here declared against robbers. A pick-pocket, as such, is not a robber, and therefore there is no right to kill him. Incendiaries are similarly exposed to the same risk, if they commit mischief which is intended to destroy any building tent or vessel used for residence or custody of property. The last clause deals with the milder forms of the three offences dealt with in the three preceding clauses, but these assume the same aggravated form by the presence of apprehension of death or grievous hurt. This clause would be utilized if there be any technical objection to a case falling into any of the three earlier clauses.

104. If the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right of private defence, be theft, mischief or criminal trespass, not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, that right does not extend to the voluntary causing of death, but does extend, subject to the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing to the wrong-doer of any harm other than death.

929. Analogous Law.—This section is as related to the last, as section 101 is to section 100. It is enacted to legalize the infliction of any harm short of death in all cases in which the offences of theft, mischief or criminal trespass are not aggravated in the manner described in the clause “fourthly” of the last section, viz., by being attended with an attempt to cause death or grievous hurt.

930. The commentary under section 101 may be read, mutatis mutandis, as a commentary on this section.

931. Meaning of Words.—“Harm other than death”: Harm implies use of force, not mere abuse punishable under section 504, which cannot be justified under this section.<sup>1</sup>

932. When Homicide is Unjustifiable.—The last section lays down the cases in which even homicide is justifiable. This section lays down that in other cases it is not. So where the accused were on their master's land, when the deceased came up with a number of men to fish in a disputed tank by force of arms. The accused were prepared for the fight, and the two parties fought in which one of the aggressors was killed. It was held that, as the act of the accused was not protected by the last section, it fell within the scope of this section, which did not justify the killing of a trespasser. But at the same time, though the accused had exceeded their right of private defence, still some consideration must be shown to them in the sentence, and their sentences were accordingly reduced to rigorous imprisonment from 7 to 3 years.<sup>2</sup> This was the case of death. But short of death the section justifies the causing of any harm, subject however to the restriction laid down in section 99 that the harm should not be more than is necessary for the purpose of defence.<sup>3</sup> And neither section takes note of the motive which prompted the harm, unless the harm caused was in itself so excessive as to be indicative of revenge. And in judging of the reasonableness of harm caused, it must be noted that though the harm caused by each individual may not be excessive or sufficient in itself to cause death, still if the cumulative effect of the injuries caused by several resulted in death, they will all be accountable for it. As Campbell, J., observed in a case: “If several parties band together, and so act in defence of property that the lawful causing of death is a natural and probable result, and death, is in fact, so caused, it would be very dangerous to hold otherwise than that they are all responsible and guilty of culpable homicide of a low degree though it be.”<sup>4</sup> But where a number of persons acting in concert are shown to have defended their property by use of force and they are acquitted of homicide, they could not be found guilty of rioting.<sup>5</sup> It is not the lawful exercise of the right of private defence to confine trespassers for the night till the arrival of the police on the following day,<sup>6</sup> unless the trespassers were guilty of non-bailable and cognizable offence.<sup>7</sup> But a person in possession of his property is entitled to use force to eject a trespasser, and the trespasser cannot complain that he was acting under orders, if his act was in fact a trespass. So where a police constable authorized to watch the movements of suspected characters entered into the house of a person at midnight and knocked at his door to see if he was there he was held to be guilty of trespass, as he had no authority to enter into the houses, of even suspected characters, and the accused who resented the constable's act by abusing and pushing him and lifting his stick to strike him was held to be protected under this section.<sup>1</sup>

933. The section says that harm may be caused to the wrong-doer, but this term would include his confederates, aiders and abettors who were present at the time of the commission of the offence, though it would not include an accomplice who was not present. If, for example, a zemindar sends out his servants to take forcible possession of property belonging to or in the possession of another, the latter would not be justified in assaulting the zemindar who did not accompany his men, though he was the principal wrong-doer.

105. The right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences.

Commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of property.

The right of private defence of property against theft continues till the offender has effected his retreat with the property or either the assistance of the public authorities is obtained, or the property has been recovered.

The right of private defence of property against robbery continues as long as the offender causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or wrongful restraint or as long as the fear of instant death or of instant hurt or of instant personal restraint continues.

The right of private defence of property against criminal trespass or mischief continues as long as the offender continues in the commission of criminal trespass or mischief.

The right of private defence of property against house-breaking by night continues as long as the house-trespass which has been begun by such house-breaking continues.

934. Analogous Law.—This section was clause 81 of the draft in which the Law Commissioners objected to the phrase “till the offender has effected his retreat with the property.” In a later opinion on this clause it was pointed out that if the clause remained, the right of private defence against robbery would cease after the robber had left the house, which could not be the intention of the framers of the Bill. But notwithstanding this criticism, this section was enacted as originally drafted.<sup>2</sup>

935. Principle.—This section lays down as to when the right of private defence of property commences. As such, the section is analogous to, and closely follows the wording of section 102 in which a similar rule for the commencement of the right for the defence of a person is enacted. The commencing periods for the two rights naturally differ with the object they are intended to serve. But in one respect they both agree, for the right to personal protection as well as the protection of property commences with the reasonable apprehension of danger to person or property. But as against theft the section declares the right to continue (a) till the offender has effected his retreat with the property; or (b) the assistance of the public authorities is obtained; or (c) the property has been recovered. The section does not say what becomes of the right if any one of the contingencies is satisfied, but the property remains unrecovered. But regard being had to the fact that the primary object of the right is to enable the owner to recover back his property, the right would appear to exist till the purpose for which the right exists has been attained. In other words, the three clauses determine the owner's right of recapture which it is for the owner to resort to at his discretion.

936. Right of Defence of Property.—The right of private defence of property commences with the reasonable apprehension of danger to such property (§§ 888-917). The meaning of this phrase has been set out elsewhere, and its meaning must be understood in the same sense here. So far the section is perfectly intelligible. But then it goes on to limit that right by fixing a period for its determination. As against theft it enacts that the right continues (a) till the offender has effected his retreat with the property, or (b) the assistance of the public authorities is obtained, or (c) the property has been recovered.

(1) Dorasamy, 27 M. 52.

(2) First Report Ss. 155, 158, Reprint p. 230.

937. This clause had been animadverted upon by the Law Commissioners (§ 934), but nevertheless, it remains unaltered. Now in order to understand the clause it must be remembered that the right of private defence of property here contemplated is the defence of property<sup>1</sup> by use of force.<sup>2</sup> This section then lays down up to what time it is lawful for a person to use force in defence of his property, that is, to prevent its seizure and removal. The recovery of his property is the sole object of this right, and therefore, the clause lays down that the use of force should cease as soon as that object has been attained, namely, the property stolen has been recovered. If, however, the property cannot be recovered, then the clause allows the owner to follow the thief till "he has effected his retreat with the property" which could only mean till the pursuit is given up. But the pursuit need not be hot on his heels, for the owner may fall behind and yet intend to continue the chase. And suppose A runs away with B's watch, and B pursues him, but A getting the better of B cannot be caught and B gives up the pursuit. He sees A the next day wearing his watch; is his right of private defence gone? In one sense A had effected his retreat with the watch. But B has not recovered the property, and so long as B's property has not been recovered, his right of private defence is assured to him by another clause. If, therefore, the two clauses are in conflict, is the felon to have the benefit of it? Such a view would be opposed to all reasonable interpretation of criminal law, and it would lead to awkward consequences. In such a case, the correct view would then seem to be that if B sees A with his stolen watch the next day, B has his right of private defence subject, of course, to the restrictions mentioned in section 99; that is to say, if B sees a policeman in sight, he must seek his protection; if he does not, he may use force on A and recover his watch.<sup>3</sup> It is said that in such a case B's right revives,<sup>4</sup> but there is no question of revival, for theft is a continuing wrong and a thief is a thief whenever he may have committed the theft. And if, therefore B sees A six months after the theft in possession of his watch, B has the same right against him as if A had only a moment before stolen it.<sup>5</sup> But this dictum must be qualified. The owner has no right to invade the privacy of another man's house in order to recover his property, that a thief may have concealed therein. Such an entry, as of right, would be trespass. But if the house belong to the thief, then the owner may lawfully enter it in pursuit of the thief, for a thief's house is not his castle.

938. When the Right Ends.—The clause makes the right subject to the limitation, that if the assistance of the public authorities has been obtained, the right of self-help ceases. In this connection the wording of this clause is materially different to the corresponding clause of section 99. According to that clause, there is no right if there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities. But under this clause, the right exists and may be asserted till the assistance of the public authorities is obtained. As this section is a special section dealing with a right directed against a special class of malefactors, it may even be contended that the owner is not bound to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities, and that he has the larger right against the thief till the public authorities choose to assist him. But this construction, though plausible is not a preferable one. For the right of private defence is a right of necessity, and it cannot therefore be asserted whenever it is possible to have recourse to the public authorities whose duty it is to suppress and apprehend crime. Moreover, though this section is not subject to section 99, still it is necessarily subject to section 104, which in its turn is subject to section 99. Consequently, it is a matter of legal obligation to have recourse to the public authorities for the protection as there required.

940. Criminal Trespass and Mischief. So in the case of criminal trespass and mischief the right remains only so long as the offence is being committed. If a trespasser has left the land, the owner cannot pursue him for the purpose of chastisement. If he does so, he cannot plead the protection of this exception. This rule only applies to criminal trespass and mischief as such, and unattended by violence. When they are so attended, the right would be enlarged as it may then be a night robbery, or it may fall under the fourth head of section 103. But where it is not so, an assembly lawful in its inception may become unlawful as soon as the trespass or mischief it was intended to remove is over. So where one Goluk Chunder in excavating a khal encroached on one Issur Chunder's land, and committed mischief by cutting the land and throwing earth on it, which was resisted by Issur's men, whereupon the mischief ceased, but the men continued to remain assembled probably to prevent even the cutting of the khal, it was held that the assembly had no right of private defence after the mischief had ceased and when there was no likelihood of its removal.<sup>2</sup> It need scarcely be added that the right is not only limited as regards duration but also as regards the property in respect of which the right exists. For instance, if the owner detects two of his stolen cattle in a herd, he has no right to seize the herd.<sup>3</sup>

941. House-breaking. House-breaking is house-trespass attended with force or surprise.<sup>4</sup> House-breaking, however, precedes house-trespass, and as house-trespass is the aim and object of house-breaking the right of private defence is enacted to last so long as such house-trespass continues. As the right of the owner against a house-breaker extends to the extent of even causing his death,<sup>5</sup> it follows that the owner, subject to other reservations, has that right only so long as the house-breaker is on the premises.<sup>6</sup> The moment he quits the premises the right too ceases. The owner has no right to run after him in the open, long after the house-trespass had ceased.<sup>7</sup>

942. Misappropriation and Receiving Stolen Property. The offences punishable under sections 403 and 411 are no exception to the offences against which the right of private defence exists,<sup>8</sup> but in such cases, of course, the accused would have to show why he had no time to have recourse to the authorities.

106. If in the exercise of the right of private defence against an assault which reasonably causes the apprehension of death, the defender be so situated that he cannot effectually exercise that right without risk or harm to an innocent person, his right of private defence extends to the running of that risk.

A is attacked by a mob who attempt to murder him. He cannot effectually exercise his right of private defence without firing on the mob and he cannot fire without risk of harming young children who are mingled with the mob. A commits no offence if by so firing he harms any of the children.

943. Analogous Law.—This section should be read with section 100 to which it relates. It is in accordance with English Law. It is a case of extreme necessity, in which a person is entitled to run the risk of harming innocent persons in order to save himself from mortal injury. Here, again the harm caused to innocent persons must have been necessary and it should not have been excessive.

CHAPTER V. OF ABETMENT.

Abetment of a thing.

107. A person abets the doing of a thing, who—

First.—Instigates any person to do that thing ; or,

Secondly.—Engages with one or more other person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and in order to the doing of that thing ; or,

Thirdly.—Intentionally aids, by any act or illegal omission, the doing of that thing.

Explanation 1. —A person who, by wilful misrepresentation, or by wilful concealment of a material fact which he is bound to disclose, voluntarily causes or procures, or attempts to cause or procure a thing to be done, is said to instigate the doing of that thing.

Illustration.

A, a public officer, is authorized by a warrant from a Court of Justice to apprehend Z. B knowing that fact and also that C is not Z wilfully represents to A that C is Z, and there by intentionally causes A to apprehend C. Here B abets by instigation the apprehension of C.

Explanation 2.—Whoever, either prior to or at the time of the commission of an act, does anything in order to facilitate the commission of that act, and thereby facilitates the commission thereof, is said to aid the doing of that act.

944. Analogous Law.—The chapter opening with this section deals with the law of what is known as accessories in English Law,

English Law. under which they are of three kinds : (i) accessory before the fact, (ii) accessory at the fact, and (iii) accessory after the fact. Now, where two or more persons are prosecuted for the same offence, they are classified as (i) principals in the first degree, (ii) principals in the second degree, (iii) accessories before the fact, or (iv) accessories after the fact. Accessories at the fact are usually classified as principals of the second degree, that is to say, aiders and abettors who are actually or constructively present at the scene of offence. In fact, the early writers did not know of the distinction between principals of the first and principals of the second degree.<sup>2</sup> They called the latter accessories at the fact, but then there grew up a rule, out of the well-known maxim of Civil law,<sup>3</sup> that as accessories they could not be brought up for trial till the principal offender had been convicted or outlawed, a procedure which was naturally productive of failure of justice as the accessory could never be brought to trial, if the principal offender died or escaped justice, or was unknown. In order to obviate this mischief, the Judges gradually adopted a rule by which such accessories became classed and were proceeded against as principals in the second degree.<sup>4</sup> Accessories at the fact and principals in the second degree are thus two designations denoting offenders of the same kind, and they have been classed as abettors under this chapter, though a distinction is made as regards the punishment appropriate to their case.<sup>5</sup>

(1) There was at one time some doubt as to the applicability of this chapter to offences subsequently added to the Code, e.g., by sections 121A, 124A, 225A, 225 B, 294A and 304A. This doubt has now been removed by the Legislature which has formally extended the chapter to those offences, see Indian Penal Code Amendment Act, s. 13 (Act XXVII of 1870) as amended by the Repealing and Amending Act (XII of 1891).

(5) S. 114.

945. As regards accessories before or after the fact, English Law differs from the rules here codified. Under English Law an accessory before the fact is one who, being absent at the time of the crime committed, doth yet procure, counsel, or command another to commit a crime,<sup>1</sup> while an accessory after the fact is one who knowing a felony to have been committed receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon. Any assistance whatever given to a felon made the assister an accessory.<sup>2</sup> Such persons have been rightly excluded from this chapter, though they have been dealt with elsewhere.<sup>3</sup> This chapter then deals only with offenders who would be classed as accessories before or at the fact, and so far only do these sections obtain their ground-work from the English cases.

946. So far as this section is concerned it follows closely the English rule applicable to such accessories, and the English cases decided thereon should be instructive authorities on the subject. But the difference between the two systems must be kept in view. Under English Law the distinction between principals in the first degree and in the second degree is limited only to felonies, and does not apply to high treason, forgery or misdemeanours in which both are treated as principals. This distinction does not find place in the Code,<sup>4</sup> which, indeed, recognizes no distinction between what are classed as felonies and what are merely misdemeanours (§ 46). Again, the Code deals with accession after the fact as an independent offence and not as a branch of the law of abetment. The chapter as such has therefore no application to them.

947. The definition of "abet" here given applies to all Acts of the Governor-General in Council, and Regulations under the Government of India Act, 1870<sup>5</sup> made after the 14th January, 1887.<sup>6</sup> Sections 109, 110, 112, and 114-117, moreover, apply to all offences under any special or local law.<sup>7</sup> So where a pleader sent a circular round to other pleaders inviting them to send him their cases, offering to share with them his fees, he was held to be guilty of abetment of an offence under s. 36 of the Legal Practitioners' Act.<sup>8</sup>

948. Principle.—This chapter penalizes abetment as abetment leads to crime and many crimes would be impossible but for the support and encouragement received from others who, though not actively co-operating with the criminal still prepare his ground and facilitate his work. Indeed it is seldom that a criminal acts without accomplices. He does not feel the same confidence as when he has friends to consult, advise and assist him in his nefarious plan. As the rich man requires a sentinel to guard his riches, so does a thief in his plans to rob them. It is the object of this chapter to punish all such as may have lent their assistance to the commission of a crime. As Bentham remarked: "The more these preparatory acts are distinguished for the purpose of prohibiting them, the greater the chance of preventing the execution of the principal crime itself. If the criminal be not stopped at the first step of his career, he may at the second, or the third. It is thus that a prudent legislator, like a skilful general, reconnoitres all the external posts of the enemy with the intention of stopping his enterprise. He places in all the defiles, in all the windings of his route, a chain of works, diversified according to circumstances but connected among themselves, in such manner that the enemy finds in each, new dangers and new obstacles."<sup>9</sup>

949. The definition of "abetment" here given is general. It is not even the definition of the abetment of an offence but of a thing which may or may not be an offence. This was necessary to embrace cases presented in the Chapter in which the Code regards the abettor as solely liable, though the person abetted may be wholly innocent. In such a case, the act of the latter would not be an offence, as that term is defined in the Code : it is merely a " thing " the abetment of which may be nevertheless punishable. The abetment of an offence is defined in the next section. Here the term is defined in the abstract. In the next section it is defined in its relation to a person as affecting his criminal responsibility. But though the term " abet " has been generally defined here, it is to be understood only as a preliminary description of the word as used in the Code. The encouragement of a virtuous act is not the " abetment of a thing " as here defined. The section describes the three shades of meaning which the term bears on the Code, which rests the degree of criminality upon the degree of abetment. The lowest form of abetment is when a person,<sup>1</sup> instigates another to do a thing. Such instigation (i) may consist of a mere solicitation without more, or (ii) may be actively engaging with another in a conspiracy to do an act, or (iii) may consist of active participation in the doing of an act, in which case the abettor is, what would be called in English Law, an accessory at the fact, or a principal in the second degree.

950. Meaning of Words.—"Instigates any person to do that thing" : The word " instigate " has been used here not as a term of art, but in its general sense as denoting illegal solicitation. A mere request to do a thing may amount to an abetment, e.g., the offer of a bribe which is refused. It is not necessary that a person instigated should be known to the instigator as for instance, a person may intend to instigate a general rebellion by his inflammatory writing.<sup>2</sup> "Engages in any conspiracy..... for the doing of that thing" : A conspiracy is an agreement by two or more persons to do an illegal act or a legal act in an illegal manner. Merely taking part in the deliberations of a conspiracy is not an abetment unless one " engages " in it, which means that unless one approves and furthers its object. Moreover, there must take place " an act or omission in pursuance of that conspiracy." "If an act or illegal omission takes place" : This means that there must be something more than a mere plotting to amount to an abetment under this clause (§ 964). There must be some act or illegal omission in pursuance of that conspiracy. The words " or illegal omission " in the clause are added ex majori cautela. In view of the provisions of section 32 they were unnecessary. "Intentionally aids by any act or illegal omission" : This clause must be read with explanation 2, which defines when a person is said to aid the doing of an act. In order to amount to abetment the aiding must have been intentional.

951. Essentials of Abetment.—Three things are essential to complete abetment as a crime : There must be an abettor ; he must abet ; and the abetment must be of an offence. This section analyses the meaning of the word " abet " as used in this connection. It lays down that a person who instigates another to do a thing abets him to do that thing. In this sense, it makes instigation tantamount to abetment. But a person may not only instigate another, he may co-operate with him, and his co-operation may consist of counsel or conjoint action. In either case there is an abetment. It is not difficult to see why a person who aids another in the commission of a crime is regarded as an abettor. Nor is it difficult to imagine why one who plots a crime and thereby facilitates its commission should be placed in the same category. But a person who merely " instigates " another may have no idea of the crime that may be committed in consequence. And, moreover, is an " instigator " worse than a co-conspirator, whose abetment is not complete unless " an act or omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy?" The question then depends upon the precise meanings attaching to the expression " instigates " (§§ 952-963), " engages " (§§ 964-973) and " intentionally aids " (§§ 973-979) which have therefore to be examined.

952. Instigation.—In the first place, then, when is a person said to instigate another? The word " instigate " literally means to goad,<sup>3</sup> or urge forward or to provoke, incite, urge or encourage to do an act, by usage now an evil act. So the words abetment, procurement, helping, maintaining and counselling have been used in the English Statutes<sup>1</sup> as if they were synonymous and conveyed the same meaning. So abetment is there described by the words "command, counsel or hire"<sup>2</sup> or more loosely by use of the words "comfort, aid, abet, assist, counsel, hire or command."<sup>3</sup> But in all these varied expressions, there is, however, one important element present, namely, that the abettor aids the offender in the commission of the crime. And when he aids him he is said to instigate him in popular parlance, and to abet him in the language of law. Such aid must be something more substantial than a mere advice. It must indicate some active suggestion, or support or stimulation to the commission of the act.<sup>4</sup> Two persons at least are, therefore, required to complete an offence by instigation. A person cannot instigate himself. He can only instigate another though that another may not be known to him. Now a person may aid another without knowing that he was aiding him to commit a crime, and his aid may be so remote as not to amount to abetment which is the policy of law to check and punish. A hotel-keeper or a person charitably disposed may, for instance, give lodging and food to a robber on his way to the crime.<sup>5</sup> A smith may provide him with tools. They both assist him in a way, but are they abettors of his crime? All assistance is not abetment. As the Court remarked: "The supplying of necessary food to a person known to be engaged in crime is not per se criminal, but, if food were supplied in order that the criminal might go on a journey to the intended scene of the crime or conceal himself, while waiting for an opportunity to commit the crime, the supplying of food would be in order to facilitate the commission of the crime, and might facilitate it."<sup>6</sup>

953. In order to amount to abetment there must then be mens rea or community of intention. Without knowledge or intention, there can be no abetment,<sup>7</sup> and the knowledge and intention must relate to the crime.<sup>8</sup> And the assistance must be something proximate<sup>9</sup> and something more than a mere passive acquiescence. So where two men having quarrelled agreed to fight with their fists each one having deposited £ 1 with the prisoner who held the amount as a stake-holder to be paid to the winner. He had otherwise nothing to do with the fight nor was he present at it. He had no reason to suppose that the life of either man would be endangered. The men fought and one of them received injuries, of which he afterwards died. The prisoner having been informed who was the winner but not knowing of the other man's danger paid over the £ 2 to the winner. He was indicted as an accessory, but was acquitted, Cockburn, C.J., delivering the judgment of the Court, having remarked: "To support an indictment for being accessory before the fact to manslaughter, there must be an active proceeding on the part of the prisoner. He is perfectly passive here, all he does is to accept the stakes."<sup>10</sup> So too it has been held that persons who are merely present at an unlawful fight, e.g., a prize fight or a duel, are not necessarily to be treated as its abettors<sup>11</sup> though the contrary has also been laid down in other cases<sup>12</sup> which have already been referred to elsewhere (§ 770). The case of persons who do more than merely witness the fight, e.g., who keep the ring, or realize the gate money, or act as seconds, is, of course, different, for they are not merely spectator haud particeps but particeps criminis.

That a person who is merely present at<sup>1</sup> or cognizant of a crime<sup>2</sup> or only conceals it<sup>3</sup> cannot be treated as an accomplice has been conceded. So words that amount to bare permission do not amount to instigation, as if A say to B "I will kill C" and B says "you may do your pleasure for me" which will not make B an abettor of A in his murder of C.<sup>4</sup> Not only acquiescence, but some degree of active support is essential to constitute instigation. Where, for example, the prisoner procured a dose of corrosive sublimate to a pregnant woman with a view to causing abortion of which she died, and it appeared that though the prisoner knew the purpose for which it had been obtained, still he had previously dissuaded her from taking it, and in fact, he had only procured it under a threat by her of suicide and in the belief that she may change her mind. It was held that he was not an abettor of murder.<sup>5</sup> It is by no means necessary that the person instigated should be known to the instigator, as where the accused desired to instigate a rebellion by rousing the masses by his inflammatory writings<sup>6</sup> nor is it necessary that the instigation should be adequate to influence them.

954. What Instigation is Abetment.—There must be then a direct incitement to crime. If it is so intended the instigation is complete, though it may have produced no effect upon the person abetted.<sup>7</sup> Nor is it necessary that the latter should have concurred in the proposal. To take an example given by the draftsmen elsewhere: "The person who without any demand, express or implied, on the part of a public servant, volunteers an offer of a bribe and induces that public servant to accept it, will be punishable under the law of abetment as an instigator. But the person who complies with a demand, however signified, on the part of a public servant, cannot be considered as guilty of instigating that public servant to receive a bribe."<sup>8</sup> In its lowest form then instigation may amount to a mere encouragement given in words or by conduct.<sup>9</sup> When in words it may be either in direct language or by suggestive innuendos, as where A says to B: "C had a case in my Court. He made a present to my wife. He won his case."<sup>10</sup> Persons who contribute to the payment of bribe, as by paying a subscription known to have been raised for the purpose, are, strictly speaking, instigators.<sup>11</sup> A person may inflame another to commit a crime not by saying so, but by harping on the injuries, real or supposed, which he has suffered, but in such a case the question would be not only what was said, but what was the speaker's intention at the time, sympathy or instigation to crime. Indeed, words of mocksympathy are often more insidious and effective than a direct incitement to violence, but at the same time it is not always easy to lay bare their true character, and it is but in very rare cases that such words would be taken to amount to an abetment of the offence they may lead up to. So the publication of obscene literature is a crime and a newspaper publishing an advertisement for the sale of obscene books is guilty of abetment as it knows that the advertisement would encourage their sale.<sup>12</sup> So again, where the prisoner had connived at the deceased's becoming a suttee, and had told her to repeat "Ram, Ram" to become a suttee, he was held guilty of abetment.<sup>13</sup>

955. Withdrawal after Instigation.—A person may instigate another and then recant before the offence is committed, but it does not seem that he is any the less responsible for his act. In England, the rule is in this respect different. So Lord Hale says: "A commands B to kill C, but before the execution thereof, A repents and countermands B, and yet B proceeds in the execution thereof; A is not accessory, for his consent continues not, and he gave timely countermand to B, but if A had repented yet if B had not been actually countermanded before the fact committed, A had been accessory."<sup>1</sup> It may be doubted if this is even a good law now in England. For the mere inciting of another to commit a crime is itself a misdemeanour in English Law though no offence was committed in pursuance of the incitement.<sup>2</sup> A misdemeanant is, of course, not an accessory under English Law (§ 945), still the result is the same. So far as this country is concerned, the retraction of an instigation does not purge the instigator of his crime, though the fact is material as evidencing intention, or as explanatory of the meaning of the instigation, or as shewing that the offence was not committed in consequence thereof<sup>3</sup> and it may in any case be proved in mitigation of sentence. Even in England, it has been held in the case of conspiracy that the entering into conspiracy completes the crime though a conspirator may withdraw from it on the spot altogether and no one be harmed.<sup>4</sup> The accused has a locus pœnitentiæ before his offence is complete but not afterwards, for then though he may have done all in his power to undo the mischief, it may still remain.

956A. An instigation may be conveyed through the medium of a third party in which case there may be no direct communication between the abettor and the actor. So if A order his servant to hire another to murder B and the servant hires C with the money of A, A is an abettor in the same way and to the same extent as if he had himself hired C to commit the deed.<sup>7</sup> And so Lord Coke, commenting on the Statute of Westminster relating to abetment, said: "Under the word 'aid' are comprehended all persons, counselling, abetting, plotting, assenting, consenting and encouraging to do the act and not present when it is committed."<sup>8</sup>

957. But a person instigating one offence cannot be held responsible for the commission of an offence wholly different from that which he had instigated.<sup>9</sup> Thus, if A, command B to burn C's house, and he in so doing commits a robbery, in which case A though an abettor of the burning is not an abettor of the robbery.<sup>10</sup> So again, if A incite B to steal C's goods on the road and B breaks into C's house for the purpose, A is an abettor of theft, but not of house-breaking.<sup>11</sup> So where several soldiers empowered to arrest a person unlawfully broke into his house and some of the soldiers began to plunder and steal his goods, the question arising whether all were equally liable, Holt, C. J., said: "That they were all engaged in an unlawful act is plain, for they could not justify breaking a man's house without making a demand first, yet all those who were not guilty of the stealing were acquitted, notwithstanding their being engaged in one unlawful act of breaking the door, for this reason because they knew not of such intent but it was a chance opportunity of stealing whereupon some of them did lay hands."<sup>12</sup>

958. In order then to make a man liable for instigation there must be something to show that it had influenced the actor, which may be presumed if he had substantially carried out the instigation. On the other hand, if his act was substantially different, it could not be presumed to be due to the instigation. If, for instance, A orders B to murder C by poison and B, instead of poisoning him murders him by a sword or other weapon or by any other means, A is an abettor of the murder, for the principal object is attained though not in the manner suggested.<sup>1</sup> So if A instigates B to steal C's goods on the road and B breaks into his house as stated before, A is not an abettor of house-breaking, though he has abetted theft. But if in such a case A had incited B to steal goods in C's house, but not to break into it, and B nevertheless broke in to effect the theft, A would be accessory to the breaking, because A, having commanded house-trespass, B had committed house-breaking which is not a very different offence.<sup>2</sup> In fact an abettor is liable for the probable consequences of his abetment, though not for the consequences not so connected with it.<sup>3</sup> So that if A advise B to rob C, and in robbing him he kills him, A is liable as an accessory to the killing whether the killing was on resistance made, or to conceal the act, or upon any other motive operating at the time of the robbery. So again, if A orders B to burn the house of C, which B does, but the flames extend and destroy D's house, A is liable as an abettor of the burning of the houses of both C and D.<sup>4</sup>

959. But does the same principle extend to a case in which A orders B to murder C and B by mistake murders D? It is said that, in such a case, A is not liable.<sup>5</sup> But the soundness of this view may be gravely doubted. Suppose A had described C to B by his stature, appearance and the like, and B mistook, from the description A gave, D for C and killed him, could it be said that A was not liable, though he had compassed D's death? In such a case A would be certainly liable. But suppose that in such a case B knew C and D, and B having a grudge of his own with D found it convenient to despatch him, could it be said that A had abetted D's death? The true solution of the question is thus proposed by Foster: "Did the principal commit the felony he stands charged with under the influence of the flagitious advice; and was the event in the ordinary course of things, a probable consequence of that felony? or did he, following the suggestions of his own wicked heart, wilfully and knowingly commit a felony of another kind, or upon a different subject?"<sup>6</sup>

960. But where the offence is committed in prosecution of some unlawful purpose, all persons who had gone in order to give assistance, if need were, for carrying such unlawful purpose into execution, would be equally liable for any offence which may be committed in prosecution of the common design. But in such case, it must appear that (i) there was a common design and that (ii) the offence was committed in prosecution of that design. So where a number of men, some of whom were armed with sticks met to commit rioting, and A ordered one of them, his servant B, to strike, whereupon, B who was unarmed picked up a stick lying by chance on the ground with which he committed grievous hurt it was held that A was liable, though B had not the stick when he was ordered to beat.<sup>7</sup> The case would have been, however, different if the assembly had previously resolved not to use sticks, and B had then picked it up to use it.<sup>8</sup> So the creditor, who ordered his servant to carry off his debtor's cattle in satisfaction of his debt, which he did, keeping the cattle in his own custody, was convicted of abetment of theft.<sup>9</sup> Instigation to do a certain act implies its negative. So where a person asked another to suppress certain facts in giving his evidence, it was held to amount to the abetment of giving false evidence.<sup>10</sup>

961. Misrepresentation or Concealment as Abetment.—Instigation

Explanation 1. may consist not only in the direct incitement to crime, but it may be wilful misrepresentation or concealment of a fact which a person is bound to disclose. In other words, a person may instigate directly or indirectly. The illustration presents a case in point. A knows that B is not C. There is a warrant for the arrest of C. He represents to the officer executing the warrant that B is C, and thereby causes the officer to arrest B. The officer is guilty of wrongful restraint, but A is guilty of abetment. Here A was not under any legal obligation to assist the officer, but having preferred his assistance he could not deceive him. But, if in such a case, suppose that the officer had arrested B, mistaking him for C, and A had not disabused him of his mistake, would A have been liable as an abettor? Certainly not. Because he was not bound to correct the officer and his omission to correct him could not visit him the consequence of instigation. But if he had been under some legal obligation to make the disclosure, his omission would then have been "a wilful concealment of a material fact which he was bound to disclose" within the meaning of this explanation.<sup>1</sup> So an omission to give information about the commission of a crime does not amount to abetment, unless such obligation involves a breach of a legal obligation.<sup>2</sup> So a policeman or a chowkidar, failing to give information about the commission of a cognizable crime, would be guilty of wilful concealment within the meaning of this explanation, and so would also be a zemindar in certain particular cases. But a private individual is only morally, not legally, bound and if he omits to do what he ought to do, he may suffer in conscience or character, but the law will not touch him.<sup>3</sup> So under the Police Act a police-officer is always on duty in his district, and bound to shelter every person in custody, and to arrest persons committing assaults likely to cause grievous bodily injury. If, therefore, he purposely keeps out of the way, knowing that some prisoners are likely to be tortured to make confessions, he is guilty of abetment.<sup>4</sup>

962. As all acts amounting to abetment must have been done prior to the act which constitutes the crime, any subsequent knowledge of the crime is wholly insufficient to constitute abetment.<sup>5</sup> And even when a person is shown to have possessed previously knowledge of a design on the part of another to commit a crime, and that he had spoken to him about it would be insufficient to constitute abetment, unless it is at the same time shown that the person aware of the design had instigated the other by word or deed to commit the offence.<sup>6</sup> Here, again, the case of a police-officer would be different, for it is shown that he was aware of such a design, he becomes liable as an abettor<sup>7</sup> for he has then a higher duty to discharge, the omission of which exposes him to the same penalty as if he were an abettor.

963. A mere intention or preparation to instigate is neither instigation nor abetment. A person who asks a doctor to supply her with poison to enable her to poison her son-in-law, does not attempt murder of her son-in-law. She may, however, be charged for abetting the doctor to abet her to commit murder, and in so far as she abets him, she is guilty of abetment.<sup>8</sup> Here there was instigation, because the object was disclosed. But suppose that in such a case the accused had asked for the poison without disclosing her object, then there would have been no abetment at all. So where one Baku took her grand-daughter from Sholapur to Tuljapur, a place in the Nizam's dominions, her object being to dedicate her to a temple as a Murli, a class of persons who generally lead a life of prostitution, it was held with reference to the applicability of section 108-A that the conduct of the accused in the British territory did not amount to anything more than mere preparation, and that her intentions to dispose of her daughter for prostitution did not amount to an abetment within the meaning of this section.<sup>9</sup> But where a number of persons, being aware of the objects of the members of an unlawful assembly, departed from the locality where such assembly was formed, it could not be said that their failure to remain and oppose the assembly amounted to instigation and in direct support of the assembly.<sup>1</sup> So where a person receives without objection an unstamped document, he cannot be held to have abetted its execution as such.<sup>2</sup>

964. Abetment by Conspiracy.—An abettor by instigation may not only be content with his instigation. He may “engage with one or more person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing,” in which case he not only instigates but conspires to commit a crime an act punishable under s. 120-B. The fact that he conspires in addition to instigating does not, however, aggravate his offence except in the four cases mentioned in s. 121-A (conspiracy to wage war), s. 311 (Thug), s. 401 (belonging to a gang of thieves), s. 402 (being a member of an assembly of dacoits). An agreement or combination to do an unlawful thing or to do a lawful thing by unlawful means in itself amounts to a criminal offence.<sup>3</sup> Before the enactment of Chapter V-A in 1913, conspiracy as such was treated as only a species of abetment and was held to be punishable as such<sup>4</sup> (s. 120). But conspiracy relates to the stage of preparation rather than abetment and though when it develops beyond the preparatory stage it amounts to and is punishable as an abetment. A mere conspiracy does not amount to abetment,<sup>5</sup> and is not punishable as such. In order to constitute conspiracy four things are essential:—(i) there must be at least two persons; (ii) they must “engage” in the commission of an act; (iii) “an act or omission” must take place in pursuance of that conspiracy; and (iv) that act or omission must have taken place “in order to the doing of that thing.”<sup>6</sup> A person A may propose to B: “Let us murder C.” B may dissent or say nothing, or he may agree. A’s proposal is met by the first clause. But it is clear that if B agrees, he is equally guilty. His case is met by this clause. As soon as A and B agree both become liable; B under this clause, and A both under this and the last clauses. If B dissents, A is nevertheless liable as an instigator under the last clause, though neither A nor B is liable under this. The two clauses thus then overlap, but this clause is intended to cover cases which, but for it, would not fall under the first or next clause.

965. Now as regards the first requisite it goes without saying that a man cannot conspire with himself. He must have at least one another to conspire with. That other may or may not be an adult. In England the two must not, however, be related to each other as husband and wife, for they are regarded as one in the eye of the law,<sup>7</sup> though the law of this country is in this respect different.<sup>8</sup> As two persons are required to constitute a conspiracy, both will be acquitted of that offence if conspiracy cannot be established against any one of them.<sup>9</sup> (§ 126).

966. Not only must there be two persons, but the two must be “engaged” in the conspiracy. If one engages an innocent person as his agent for the commission of a crime, there is no conspiracy, for the two had not the common intention. Conspiracy is a secret combination of men to commit a crime in concert. Such combination may be formed by an agreement, or it may be the result of an understanding. Two persons, Kelly and MacCarthy, had been engaged by the prosecutor for unloading oats from a vessel, and carrying them to his warehouse, Kelly being employed to draw them from the vessel and MacCarthy to carry them to Kelly’s trams on which they were carried. Whilst one bag was being thus conveyed, Kelly said to McCarthy: “It is all right” and shortly afterwards McCarthy stole some oats out of two sacks and put them under the tram. Kelly was absent when this was done, but he returned and took away the stolen oats with the rest. It was contended for Kelly that he could not be convicted of theft, but Maule, J., said that it was all one transaction in which both concurred, and that both having concurred, and both being present at some parts of the transaction, both might be convicted.<sup>1</sup> They would be 'convicted here of conspiracy under s. 120-A, which is much wider than the abetment punishable under this section or the rule enacted in s. 34. Indeed, almost all cases of abetment, resulting in crime thereupon, would fall under the head of conspiracy, the only difference being that the abettor, as such, may be less guilty than the conspirator, as, where he merely instigates another to do a thing which the other may not agree to do, in which case, the offence abetted is not actually committed in consequence of the abetment. An example would suffice to illustrate the difference. A instigates B to murder C, B refuses. Here A has abetted B but there is no conspiracy. Even in such a case, B agrees to commit murder, but does no other overt act in pursuance of the agreement, neither A nor B can be charged of conspiracy. But, if B does an overt act, both A and B would be equally guilty, though in a case of abetment A would be less guilty than B. The distinction between the two cases is at times fine and in many cases, it is without a difference; but the distinction exists and has been made in the law, which must be recognised.

967. So far abetment is concerned, one thing is, however, clear, namely, that in order to charge a person with abetment under this clause, it must be shown that he had "engaged" in the conspiracy. That engagement of necessity postulates knowledge of the common design. It is not necessary that all co-conspirators should be equally informed as to the details, for there is always such a thing as an inner circle in conspiracy but they must at least be aware of the general purpose of the plot, and that purpose must, of course, be unlawful. The engagement here spoken of may consist of nothing beyond a mere connivance and countenance on their part, as where a woman prepared herself for suttee in the presence of the prisoners who followed her to the pyre, and stood by her, one of them, her step-son, crying "Ram, Ram," and another asking the deceased to repeat "Ram, Ram" in order to become suttee, on which the Court found that the prisoners had all engaged with her in a conspiracy for the commission of the suttee.<sup>2</sup> The test of guilt in such cases is not what was the object of the accused, but whether, having regard to the immediate object of the instigation or conspiracy, the act done by the principal is one which, according to ordinary experience and common sense, the abettor must have foreseen as probable.<sup>3</sup>

968. The third essential element of this clause is that in order to constitute and complete a conspiracy there must take place "an act or omission in pursuance of that conspiracy." (iii) There must be Consequent Act. All that this phrase means is that there is no conspiracy so long as it rests in intention merely. Two or more persons may be animated by the same intention. But the mere community of intention is not conspiracy. The law distinguishes between acts intended and acts done. If, however, they agree to carry out their intention into effect, their agreement is an act in advancement of the intention which each of them has conceived in his mind. So Willes, J., said: "A conspiracy consist not merely in the intention of two or more, but in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. So long as such a design rests in intention only, it is not indictable. When two agree to carry it into effect, the very plot is an act in itself, and the act of each of the parties, promise against promise, actus contra actum, capable of being enforced if lawful, punishable if for a criminal object or for the use of criminal means."<sup>4</sup>

969. Such an agreement may be proved by words spoken or acts and circumstances evidencing confederacy and common purpose. That purpose must be a defined act and not some vague suspicion resting upon no solid foundation.

Where, for instance, one Sher Ali, a transfrontier resident, was found concealed in a deserted house in a village in the Kohat district with three companions, all armed to the teeth, the Commissioner convicted them under section 393, but the Chief Court of the Punjab reversed it on appeal, holding that the mere assembling of a number of persons together with general intention of committing theft, and not for the purpose of committing a specific theft or theft of specific property, cannot be considered to amount to the abetment of an offence: "There must be a design to commit a specific offence before a person can be held guilty of abetment of such offence by having conspired with others to commit it."<sup>1</sup> In this case the men were evidently lying in wait in pursuance of a conspiracy, the nature and object of that conspiracy was not ascertainable, but it could have been presumed that the facts warranted an inference that the men contemplated some heinous crime—it may have been theft, it may have been murder. If so, the case would appear to have satisfied the test laid down by Willes, J., of a completed conspiracy. But as a mere conspiracy is not an offence unless it is a conspiracy to commit a crime, the men could not be convicted of abetment in the absence of any evidence as to the crime that had in view. Where a person intended to forge a document and for that purpose he conspired with others, and to that end he prepared a draft and purchased a stamp-paper upon which he was about to copy it; the stamp-paper purchased was of a sufficiently early date and in order to complete the instrument, he applied to a witness to furnish him with a Telugu date corresponding with the English date, which it was intended the forgery should bear; it was held that the facts were sufficient to warrant a conviction of the accused for abetment of forgery.<sup>2</sup> In this case the accused had already performed some acts in pursuance of the conspiracy. These acts were held to have constituted forgery, but the High Court rightly remarked that the draft could not pass for the original and was, therefore, not a forgery, nor was it an attempt at one, since there was no beginning of the commission of the act. It was a preparation for an attempt, but no one can be convicted for a mere preparation, as the law allows a locus pœnitentiæ, and will not hold that a person has attempted a crime until he has passed beyond the stage of preparation.

970. The distinction between preparation for an attempt, an attempt, and an abetment must, therefore, be clearly borne in mind. Attempt and Preparation Distinguished. Against a preparation merely, there is a locus pœnitentiæ against an attempt there is none. Some attempts are complete offences in themselves and they are punishable as such,<sup>3</sup> others are punishable under the general provisions of section 511. An act may amount to a preparation, but not to an attempt, whilst another may amount only to an abetment. The former consists in planning, designing and arranging means and measures necessary for the commission of an offence; the latter is the direct movement towards the commission after the preparation is made. It is not of the essence of an attempt any more than of abetment that there should be a power in the offender to complete the offence. For a person may be convicted of attempting to shoot with a gun which could not be discharged.<sup>4</sup> So a person may be convicted of picking a pocket, which, in fact, was empty.<sup>5</sup> So where a woman erroneously believing herself to be with child, conspired with other persons to administer drugs to herself or to use instruments on herself with intent to procure abortion, she was held to be guilty of conspiracy to procure abortion, though abortion was impossible.<sup>6</sup> In one case, the prisoner having had a quarrel with the prosecutor threatened "to burn him up." He went to a neighbouring stack, and kneeling down close to it, struck a lucifer match but discovering that he was watched, blew out the match and went away, Pollock, C. B., told the jury that the prisoner might be convicted of an attempt if they thought that he had intended to set fire to the stack and would have done so, if he had not been interrupted. "It is clear that every act committed by a person with the view of committing the felonies therein mentioned is not within the Statute; as for instance, buying a box of lucifer matches to set fire to a house. The act must be one immediately and directly tending to the execution of the principal crime, and committed by the prisoner under such circumstances as that he has the power of carrying his intention into execution. If two persons were to agree to commit a felony, and one of them were, in execution of his share in the transaction, to purchase an instrument for the purpose, that would be a sufficient overt act in an indictment for conspiracy but not in an indictment of this nature."<sup>1</sup>

971. The acts of one co-conspirator are thus the acts of all, for which they are conjointly responsible. As Couch, C. J., said: "Where several persons are proved to have combined together for the same illegal purpose, any act done by one of the parties in pursuance of the original concerted plan, and with reference to the common object is in the contemplation of the law the act of the whole. Each party is an agent of the others in carrying out the objects of the conspiracy and doing anything in furtherance of the common design."<sup>2</sup> So if A live in Calcutta he may be tried at Patna for the acts of his agent there.<sup>3</sup>

972. Lastly, the act or illegal omission must have been done not only in pursuance of the conspiracy, but also in pursuance of the (iv) "In order to the doing of that thing." object of the conspiracy. Where an act is not performed in pursuance of the common design there can be no joint responsibility. If suppose A and B conspire to murder C, and for that purpose A sends B to the chemist's to obtain poison. B starts for the chemist's but robs D on the way. A could not be held liable as an abettor of the robbery. The subject will have to be more fully discussed under section 111.

973. Intentional Aid.—The third mode of abetment described in the "Thirdly." section is by intentionally aiding any act or illegal omission in the doing of a thing. Any facility afforded to the doing of an act is, as the explanation has it, equivalent to aiding in the doing of the thing. Intentional aid may then consist of (i) either the doing of an act, directly assisting the commission of the crime; or (ii) it may consist of an act which, though not directly assisting in its commission, affords facilities for its commission; or again (iii) it may not be an act at all, but an illegal omission resulting in the same consequence.

974. Direct Acts.—Acts directly contributing to the commission of a crime do not present any difficulty. If the act was done intentionally to assist and it had that effect, the actor is unmistakably an abettor. As Bramwell, B., in a case told the jury: "Suppose two men go out together, and one of them holds a third man for the purpose of enabling his companion to cut that man's throat, and his companion does so, no one could doubt that they were both equally guilty of murder."<sup>4</sup> So where several persons act in concert to perpetrate a fraud, the act of each person is an intentional aid in prosecution of the common object. So if several make distinct parts of a forged instrument, each is liable, though he does not know by whom the other parts are executed, and though it is finished by one alone in the absence of the others.<sup>5</sup>

975. So in theft, the servant opening the door to let in thieves intentionally aids them so as to be an abettor.<sup>6</sup> So accomplices standing at a distance to help thieves in conveying the property stolen are abettors even if they took no part in theft and were at such distance from the scene of offence as not to be able to assist in it.<sup>7</sup> So where one stole a horse and another assisted him in colouring and disguising it, he was held to be an accessory.<sup>8</sup> So persons who assist in the rescue of a prisoner are liable under this clause. In fact the assistance given may consist of any aid, however small and distantly connected with the crime, but if it is given with the intention of assisting the malefactor in his crime, it amounts to abetment within the meaning of this clause.

976. Abetment by Giving Facility.—This leads to the question of acts affording facility for the commission of a crime. If A wants

Explanation 2. to strike B and his companion C lends him his stick with which he assaults B, C is guilty of abetment as by lending his stick to A he has facilitated the causing of hurt to B.<sup>1</sup> Such was the case of Eshan Meah who happened to be present with one Bedoo, who, having had a difference, with his coolies, asked Eshan to bring him a dao which he did, with which Bedoo severely hurt a coolie: "It is quite clear, that a person who, under the circumstances detailed by the evidence, gives a dao into the hands of another person, who has already given out his intention of coercing the party against whom he is acting by using the words 'I will see to this man' must be presumed to be intentionally doing something in order to facilitate the commission of the subsequent act, and therefore, in the words of the law, abets the commission of that act."<sup>2</sup> So where a certain Namghur (a village authority) suspecting a woman to be big with child ordered two of the accused to seize her and take her to the house of the zemindar to account for it and the accused said that they would have to beat her to make her confess, and they thereupon seized and tortured her till she died, it was held that the appellant's act in ordering her seizure had facilitated the crime and that he was, therefore, liable as an abettor within the meaning of Explanation 2 of this section.<sup>3</sup> Here it will be seen the accused was told of the beating beforehand, and he did nothing to prevent it. If he had not been made aware of it, his fate would have been probably different as in the case of the Head Constable who had deputed two Chowkidars to take a person, charged with being in possession of illicit liquor, home to fetch a bribe whom the Chowkidars confined and tortured on the way, in which case, the Chowkidars alone were held responsible for their acts.<sup>4</sup>

977. A priest who officiates to solemnize a bigamous marriage stands in the same predicament,<sup>5</sup> for, by his act he facilitates the commission of the offence of bigamy. But persons who are present at such marriage could not be charged with abetment nor those who granted accommodation in their house for the marriage, for it could have been equally celebrated elsewhere.<sup>6</sup> So where a theft had been committed in the house of the zemindar of a village and a report made to the Police, brought the accused, a Sub-Inspector of Police, upon the scene, who commenced his investigation by collecting some Khangars in the zemindar's house where he proceeded to torture them with a view to forcing them to give information, and it appeared that the accused who had given the house was at times present when the torturing was going on, it was held that the giving of the house and its use by the Sub-Inspector was the allowing of such facility for the commission of the act as to amount to abetment within the meaning of this explanation.<sup>7</sup> "We also find," said Edge, C.J., and Blennerhassett, J., "that he (the accused) must have known that if he did not allow the Thanadar to use and occupy his house for the purpose of torturing these men, the torturing would have to be stopped, and could not be proceeded with."<sup>8</sup> So the fact that the accused wrote and attested a sale-deed of a child purchased by a prostitute for purposes of prostitution would not expose them to the liability of abettors under section 372,<sup>9</sup> for their assistance was not essential to the commission of the crime, which might have been completed by procuring other writers, or even without any writing. The facility afforded must then be such as was essential for the commission of the crime. In the complex organization of human society life is dependent upon constant human assistance.

Such assistance is given alike to the innocent as to the wicked. It is not, however, that assistance which law condemns.

978. As the Madras High Court in a case remarked: "The supplying of food to a person about to commit a crime is not necessarily an abetment of the crime.....The supplying of necessary food to a person known to be engaged in crime is not per se criminal; but, if food were supplied in order that the criminal might go on a journey to the intended scene of the crime, or conceal himself while waiting for an opportunity to commit the crime, the supplying of food would be in order to facilitate the commission of the crime and might facilitate it."<sup>1</sup>

979. Criminality therefore rests not so much on the facility given, as on its nature and effect and the intention with which it was given. For example, it is settled that mere presence at the commission of a crime is not an abetment of it, if the person present has no authority to interfere.<sup>2</sup> But if the person present holds some position of rank and influence, so that his countenancing what takes place may, under the circumstances, be held a direct encouragement, it may amount to an abetment.<sup>3</sup> Suppose, for instance, that a faction fight between the servants of the two zemindars is going on, and one of them appears and watches it; would not his dependants take courage and attempt deeds which they would not have otherwise done? Or suppose that a responsible officer of police withdraws on seeing that his subordinates were torturing a prisoner, or that he does nothing to prevent them from torturing him. In the first case he facilitates the commission of his crime by his withdrawal, in the other he is guilty of an illegal omission.<sup>4</sup>

980. When, however, there is no obligation, an act not so intended, but offering facility for the commission of the crime, cannot be condemned as criminal. Where, for instance, one A knew that B's wife was carrying on a criminal intrigue with C, which B himself suspected. A informed him of an assignation which B's wife had with her paramour, and A and B went thither, the latter armed with a stick, and B finding his wife in the act of committing adultery, pursued her paramour for fifty paces and then struck and killed him. B's wife wanted to run away, but A detained her till B returned and turned upon her, striking her severely and leaving her for dead. A was convicted of abetting the murder of C, but the Chief Court held that A had abetted no offence.<sup>5</sup> Here it will be observed that A had distinctly afforded facility to B to meet C under circumstances which could not but have made A believe that B would commit an offence, if he saw C with his wife. But that was not his proximate intention, and in informing B of the criminal conduct of his wife with C he had done nothing wrong. Again, A's detention of B's wife was not shown to have been with the object of enabling B to commit a murderous assault upon her. His acts, therefore, were innocent though they gave B the facility of killing C and grievously injuring his own wife.

981. In the case of illegal omission criminal liability for abetment depends no less upon the provisions of this Code than upon the obligation created or duty imposed by other laws. In the case of a person under such obligation, in order to constitute abetment, it must be shown that the accused intentionally aided the offence by his non-interference.<sup>6</sup> But encouragement would be presumed in the case of a police-officer whose duty as a conservator and warden of peace is to prevent the commission of crime. If, therefore, he knows that a crime is being committed and does nothing to prevent it, he is guilty of an abetment on account of his illegal omission. So where a Head Constable of Police perceiving that his subordinates were about to torture a prisoner left the place so as not to be a witness of what occurred, it was held that he was guilty of abetment of the offence that was committed in his absence. He certainly omitted to do that which he was bound to do. It was illegal in him, knowing that an offence of this kind was to be committed, to go away in order that that crime should be committed.<sup>1</sup> In such a case it is immaterial that the torture was being applied by or under the orders of a superior officer. It is the duty of the police to shelter a person in custody, and to arrest persons committing assaults likely to cause grievous bodily injury. When the law imposes on a person a duty to act, his illegal omission to act renders him liable to punishment. Consequently, a policeman who stands by and does nothing to prevent a person being tortured by another, is guilty of abetment in the same manner as if he had actually encouraged it.<sup>2</sup> The same responsibility rests on Magistrates and other guardians of peace.<sup>3</sup> In such cases the measure of responsibility is the duty imposed by law. A village Chowkidar in Bengal is not, for example, bound to prevent the commission of a non-cognizable case, e.g., extortion.<sup>4</sup>

982. There is a difference between an illegal omission to prevent an offence, and the illegal concealment of an offence about to be committed. The latter is, of course, punishable,<sup>5</sup> but as the Law Commissioners remarked: "This is a remote and precarious aid, which, though deserving of punishment is surely very different from that which is supposed to be rendered in the former case, conducing by an immediate influence and a positive efficacy to the commission of the offence."<sup>6</sup>

108. A person abets an offence who abets either the commission of an offence, or the commission of an act which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence with the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor.

Explanation 1.—The abetment of the illegal omission of an act may amount to an offence although the abettor may not himself be bound to do that act.

Explanation 2.—To constitute the offence of abetment, it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused.

(b) A, with the intention of murdering Z, instigates B, a child under seven years of age, to do an act which causes Z's death. B, in consequence of the abetment, does the act in the absence of A and thereby causes Z's death. Here, though B was not capable by law of committing an offence, A is liable to be punished in the same manner as if B had been capable by law of committing an offence, and had committed murder, and he is therefore subject to the punishment of death.

But A is guilty of abetting theft and is liable to the same punishment as if B had committed theft.

Explanation 5.—It is not necessary to the commission of the offence of abetment by conspiracy that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engage in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.

Illustration.

A concerts with B a plan for poisoning Z. It is agreed that A shall administer the poison. B then explains the plan to C, mentioning that a third person is to administer the poison, but without mentioning A's name. C agrees to procure the poison, and procures and delivers it to B for the purpose of its being used in the manner explained. A administers the poison; Z dies in consequence. Here, though A and C have not conspired together, yet C has been engaged in the conspiracy in pursuance of which Z has been murdered. C has therefore committed the offence defined in this section, and is liable to the punishment for murder.

983. Analogous Law.—This section was re-drafted after it left the hands of the original committee, in whose draft it stood as clause 87. It is now far more comprehensive and complete, and in substance it is based on the English Law, with this difference that while in England a person employing an innocent agent to commit a crime will be dealt with as a principal here he still remains an abettor, though the principal was only a tool in his hands. Thus in England the abettor of a child under 7 or a mad man, or any person of defective mind would be the principal ex necessitate, though he were absent when the thing was done;<sup>1</sup> he would be under the Code liable only as an abettor. But, as the Law Commissioners remark the effect in each case is the same.<sup>2</sup> In other respects the section is in entire harmony with the English Law and the explanations are taken from its decided cases.

984. Principle.—This section defines an abettor to mean (i) the abettor of an offence, and (ii) the abettor of an act which would have been normally an offence were it not for the incapacity of the actor. The reason for holding the abettor liable in the second case is self-evident. He is in fact the sole author of the crime, but as the punishment is in each case the same,<sup>3</sup> it is a distinction without a difference for whether he is called an abettor or the principal he can in either case be equally punished.

985. Meaning of Words.—“The commission of an act,” which is criminal though the actor is exempt from punishment. “The abetment of an illegal omission,” as where a private person advises a police officer to withdraw from a scene of torture. Here he would not have been guilty if he had himself withdrawn, but his abetment of the police officer who was in duty bound to stay and stop the torture is criminal. “Or that the effect requisite should be caused”: Suppose, for instance, that a person advises another to kill by means of charms would it be an abetment? Under the clause it will be, but this seems doubtful (§ 991). “Should be capable by law,” e.g., a child, a person non compos mentis; vide illustrations. “Abetment of an abetment,” as where A requests B to induce C to murder D, and B does so.

(2) First Report, 182.

(3) S. 109.

Here B abets murder and A abets B's abetment.<sup>1</sup> "Abetment by conspiracy": Members of secret societies seldom know the actual perpetrators of the crime. So where persons are balloted for to commit crimes only the person reading the ballots knows the name of the person deputed to do the deed.

986. Who is an Abettor.—The last section defines only the abetment of a thing. Now a thing may or may not be an offence. If it is an offence, the person who abets is here defined to be the abettor. If it is not an offence because of the incapacity of the actor, the person abetting its commission is also an abettor. But if it is not an offence at all, then the person abetting its commission is not an abettor, and that act ceases to have any meaning in the Code.<sup>2</sup> In order then that there should be an abettor liable to punishment, there must be at least an act which must possess the ingredients of an offence. But every act implies the author of that act. That person may not himself be liable to punishment, but he must have committed the act either by himself or in participation with some one else. In the former case he is the principal and in the latter case a conspirator. And abetment is possible only in these two cases. If, therefore, there is neither, no person can be proceeded against as an abettor though his act may have been illegal.

987. Such was the case where a Mahomedan infant girl aged six, possessed of considerable properties, had been thrice married to three different persons by persons who professed to be her guardians. She was first given away in marriage to A by her mother, which marriage was, however, invalid, as the proper persons to give her away in marriage were her paternal uncles and not her mother. Consequently, another marriage was solemnized between the same parties at which one paternal uncle, Abdul Subhan, was alleged to be present and to have given away the bride. A few weeks later her third marriage was solemnized at which both her guardian uncles Abdul Karim and Abdul Subhan were alleged to be present, who gave her away in marriage to another man. Thus her two uncles were charged for abetting a bigamous marriage under sections 109 and 494 of the Code. The Sessions Judge found that Abdul Subhan who had taken part in the second marriage was not present at the third marriage. He was accordingly acquitted, Abdul Karim alone being convicted of abetment. But the High Court, on appeal set aside his conviction, holding that as the infant was a mere cypher in the transaction, the acquittal of Abdul Subhan removed the only other ground upon which the accused could have been convicted: "To establish a charge of abetment under the Penal Code, the accused must be proved either to have instigated or aided some other person to commit the offence, or to have engaged with another in a conspiracy for the commission of the offence. The acquittal of Abdul Subhan, who was jointly charged with the prisoner, puts an end to the case of the conspiracy, for except with Abdul Subhan, there is no evidence to support a case of conspiracy. If, therefore, the conviction can be upheld, it must be in consequence of the prisoner having instigated or aided Harunissa to contract a second marriage. The evidence shows that Harunissa took no part in nor was present at the ceremony which the prisoner caused to be performed in her name. .... Although the effect of the ceremony would have been, supposing the prisoner was acting within the authority given him by law, to bind the infant by the marriage so contracted yet she was not less personally a stranger to both the ceremony and the contract. Assuming the facts and law to be as found and laid down by the Sessions Court, the prisoner has committed an illegal act in disposing of his infant ward in marriage after he knew that she had been previously lawfully disposed of in marriage by the younger paternal uncle; but, in doing this act, he was, according to the evidence, the sole actor; and the act, though illegal, is not, if done by one person alone, an offence provided for by the Penal Code."<sup>3</sup> This case then establishes that an abettor must either be an instigator or a conspirator. Consequently, a married woman cannot be held to abet her own abduction.<sup>1</sup>

988. Then again, as the Code does not regard accessories after the fact in the light of abettors,<sup>2</sup> persons who support the abettor cannot be tried for subsequent abetment. Where, for instance, a person, makes a false charge against another, the offence is complete. Persons who support his false charge by their evidence cannot then be tried as abettors not for their previous acts, but for having given their evidence subsequently in support of the charge.<sup>3</sup> So, where the accused removed certain things from the house of his father with whom he was living, and gave them to a woman with whom he was on intimate terms, it was held that the woman could not be an abettor of theft<sup>4</sup> though on a proper case being made out, she might have been convicted of receiving stolen property. So where A entered the house of B without his permission and committed adultery with his wife, A could be convicted both of house-trespass and adultery, the two offences being distinct, but B's wife could not be convicted of the abetment of house-trespass though she may have invited A.<sup>5</sup> A person may be charged both for the abetment as well as for the commission of an offence, but if he is convicted of the main offence, he cannot be also convicted of the abetment of the same offence.<sup>6</sup>

989. It will be observed that the section makes no distinction between a principal who is innocent and one who is himself guilty. Agent Innocent. In either case the offence of the abettor remains the same.<sup>7</sup> In England, however, in the former case the principal is regarded merely as an agent and the abettor is treated as the real principal. The difference is, however, not material, for the result is in each case the same. In England, such an offender would be punished as a principal—here he would be punished as an abettor. For example, if a person cashed a forged note in England through another who was ignorant about the forgery, the act of the latter would be the act of the former, though he was then absent: qui facit per alium facit per se. He will then be punished as the principal,<sup>8</sup> though under this section his act would be that of an abettor only. So if A poisons through B, A is an accessory only if B is amenable as a principal but not otherwise.<sup>9</sup>

990. The case contemplated in the first explanation is different to the cases arising under the section. It assumes the presence of two persons and it then apportions their criminal liability. The Explanation 1. explanation relates to the same person and shows that he may be guilty as an abettor, though as a principal he may be innocent. Such a case arises where a private person instigates a police-officer to leave a scene of cognizable offence which it is his duty to prevent. Here the policeman is guilty of an illegal omission, and therefore, of an abetment of the offence committed in his presence. The private person is guilty of no such offence, as it was not his duty to interfere. He is however guilty of abetting the police-officer in his illegal omission, and, as such, he is guilty of abetment, though he was not himself bound to do the act which it was the duty of the police-officer to do.

991. Act or Effect Immaterial.—The second explanation lays down a rule which has already been considered, and which, indeed, flows from the definition of abetment. As before remarked, abetment depends upon the instigation, and not upon the effect it has upon another. As was observed in a case, “the offence of abetment by instigation depends upon the intention of the person who abets, and not upon the act which is actually done by the person whom he abets."<sup>1</sup> The conviction of the abettor is, therefore, in no way dependent upon the conviction of the principal.<sup>2</sup> The offence of abetment is complete with the instigation, notwithstanding that the person abetted refuses to do the thing, or doing it the expected result does not follow, or that the means which are intended to be employed are such that it is physically impossible that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused by them.<sup>3</sup> So Lawrence, J., said in a case of abetting abortion: "It is immaterial whether the shrub was saving or not, or whether it was capable of procuring abortion or even whether the woman was actually with child. If the prisoner believed at the time that it would procure abortion, and administered it with that intent, the case is within the Statute<sup>4</sup> and he is guilty of the offence laid to his charge."<sup>5</sup> So in another case the prisoner was indicted for administering saffron to a female for a similar purpose, and her counsel was cross-examining her as to her having taken something else before the saffron, and also to the innocuous nature of the article, whereupon Vaughan, B., said: "Does that signify? It is with the intention that the jury have to do; and if the prisoner administered a bit of bread merely with intent to procure abortion, it is sufficient."<sup>6</sup> But these cases were decided upon the language of the Statute which used the words "any medicine or other thing." They illustrate no sound principle, and their soundness has since been disposed of by the Legislature.<sup>7</sup> Suppose a person commands another to commit murder by sorcery and by no other means, would that be an abetment of murder which is impossible. It appears to have been the opinion of Westropp, C.J.,<sup>8</sup> that it would not, but the point was not res integra before him. On the other hand, the Punjab Chief Court have in a considered judgment upheld the view that abetment is none the less complete because it is physically impossible to produce the effect by the means suggested.<sup>9</sup> That Court supports its conclusions on the analogy of section 571. The clause should probably be read in the light of illustration (b), as meaning that an abetment may be complete though the effect contemplated was not caused, but not if it was initially impossible.

992. Agent may be innocent.—The third explanation is amply illustrated and it formulates a rule already considered (§ 989). It really strives to make clear what was already clear from the section. The employment of a person legally incompetent to commit an offence, or of an innocent agent does not absolve the abettor from his criminal liability, on the other hand it rests undivided upon him and is thus an element of aggravation. The innocent agent is then merely his tool and the abettor is really the principal, and is so regarded and dealt with in England (§ 983). Here he is punishable as an abettor, though the principal is innocent and escapes scotfree.<sup>10</sup> Such are illustrations (b), (c) and (d). The last illustration was relied upon in a case where one A had sold some trees belonging to B to C with the intention that C should cut them down. C knew nothing about B's interest in them. A did, and it was therefore held that though C's felling of the trees was no offence, still A's act was an abetment of theft of B's trees by C for which he was rightly convicted.<sup>11</sup>

993. The abetment of an abetment is an offence when the principal abet-

ment was an offence. Such would be the case where a third person intervenes between the abettor and the actor. In such a case all that is required is that the substantive abetment must be the abetment of an offence. It is not necessary that such offence should be committed.

So where A, the servant of B, was approached by C with the intention of robbing B, who reported the fact to B. B wishing to entrap C allowed A to assist C in robbing him, whereupon A made over his master's goods to C, who was then prosecuted for abetment of theft by A, and the question was whether A had committed theft and C had abetted him. So far as A is concerned he had removed the goods with his master's consent. He could not, therefore, be held to have committed theft. The question was then reduced to this: Did C abet A for the commission of theft which in fact he did not commit, and it was held that C was guilty of abetting an offence. As Jackson, J., observed: "Under explanation 4 the abetment of an abetment being an offence, and the prisoner having instigated Cummins (A) to do that which, if committed, would have been an offence, he has himself thereby committed an offence, and inasmuch as by explanation 2 to constitute the offence of abetment, it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, therefore the circumstances that, owing to the property being removed with the knowledge of the owner, the technical offence of theft had not been committed does not save the prisoner from the consequence of the abetment which he has been guilty of, and, therefore, he has been properly convicted."<sup>1</sup>

994. Consequently, as remarked before, the conviction of the abettor is in no way dependant upon the conviction of the principal. The latter may have absconded or if tried may have even been acquitted, but the abettor is not entitled to claim the same verdict on the ground that his principal has been acquitted.<sup>2</sup> In this respect the English rule was at one time different (§ 944), but the modern rule is now in both countries the same,<sup>3</sup> abetment being made in England,<sup>4</sup> as it is in this country, a substantive offence. So where A and B were jointly indicted for stealing, and A alone was separately indicted for receiving stolen goods, and at the trial no evidence was offered against B, and he was acquitted, in order that he might be called as a witness against A, and it was proved as against A that he had abetted B to steal, and that he afterwards received the goods so stolen, A was convicted on both the counts, Erle, C. J., observing: "We consider the conviction may be sustained as a substantive absolute felony. Suppose the accessory is captured before the principal; under the Statute<sup>5</sup> he may be at once tried and convicted. If afterwards the principal is taken, tried, and acquitted, has the accessory a right to be discharged? We are of opinion that he has no such right. His sentence may have expired; is any wrong done him? We think not; whether he is tried before or at the same time as the principal, he may be guilty as an accessory, although the principal be acquitted, it being by no means certain that, although acquitted, the principal is not really guilty."<sup>6</sup> But, of course, though the principal may not be punished, the evidence against the abettor must establish all the points necessary to complete his guilt. If, for instance, a person is charged for an abetment of murder, the murderer may not have been brought to book, but there must be evidence against the abettor to show that there had been a murder, and that the accused had instigated it.<sup>7</sup>

995. If, therefore, in such a case a person had been tried for committing the murder, and he was acquitted on the ground that there never had been any murder, the abettor thereto could not be convicted on a finding, however arrived at, that there had been a murder. So it was ruled by the Punjab Chief Court following the practice of the late Sudder Court at Agra that the conviction of the abettor could not be maintained if it involved findings of fact inconsistent with the findings already recorded against the principal and that in such a case, whether on appeal or on revision, the Court would be justified in reversing the findings so as to avoid the two remaining inconsistent and contradictory.<sup>8</sup> Where the prisoner asked a native doctor to supply her with medicine for the purpose of poisoning her son-in-law, which he refused, it was held that the prisoner's act was a mere preparation and not an attempt to commit murder, but that it might be held to have been an abetment of the native doctor to abet the accused in the commission of murder within the meaning of this explanation, and therefore, punishable under sections 302 and 116 of the Code.<sup>1</sup>

996. The last explanation is based upon an English precedent<sup>2</sup> already noticed (§ 966). As before remarked, it is not necessary, and not indeed always possible that all conspirators should be

Explanation 5. equally informed of the details of the plot. This is because all conspiracies are hatched in secret and all cannot be equally trusted with its plans. Nor are all perhaps equally interested and zealous workers. As the general has his council of war, so has the arch-conspirator his chosen satellites. They form as it were his cabinet, and they are the sole repositories of the secrets, in the furtherance of which the rank and file are content to work under orders. It is, therefore, the purpose of the clause that all should be amenable to law, and a conspirator will be equally liable with his chief, though he may not be directly connected with him, and though he may not have shared his secrets.

108-A. A person abets an offence within the meaning of this Code who, in British India, abets the commission of any act without and beyond British India which would constitute an offence if committed in British India.

Abetment in British India of offences outside it.

Illustration.

A, in British India, instigates B a foreigner in Goa, to commit a murder in Goa. A is guilty of abetting murder.

997. Analogous Law.—This section is new, and was added to the Code by the Amending Act of 1898,<sup>3</sup> in order to overrule a decision of the Bombay High Court<sup>4</sup> in which it was held that the abetment in British India by a British subject of an offence committed in foreign territory was not an offence under the Code. This section remedies the defect existing in the Code and noticed in that case.<sup>5</sup>

998. Principle.—It is against international comity and the laws of nations that one State should breed conspirators threatening the peace and security of its neighbours. Conspiracies to commit offences in friendly Foreign States are therefore regarded as offences against the State itself, and they are punishable as such. But being international offences, they require the co-operation and assistance of the Foreign State concerned from where witnesses may have to be summoned. There may be cases too in which it would be a matter of high political expediency to consult the State concerned before instituting a prosecution. The Procedure Code restricts indiscriminate prosecutions accordingly.

999. Abetment of Foreign Offence.—This section provides for the punishment of abetment of the commission of an offence outside British India. It requires only that the offence abetted shall also be an offence recognized in British India, and that its abetment shall be complete in British India. If, therefore, the only act committed in British India amounts to a mere preparation, the actual abetment being committed in foreign territory, it cannot be punished under this section. So where one Baku, and her husband Tukaram, took her minor grand-daughter by name Piri, a girl under sixteen years of age, from Sholapur to Tuljapur, a place in the Nizam's dominions, her object being to dedicate her there to the goddess Amba, and thus to make her an aradhin murli, who generally led the life of prostitution, it was held that the mere removal of the girl from British territory did not amount to abetment. " Mere intention not followed by any act cannot constitute an offence, and an indirect preparation which does not amount to an act which amounts to a commencement of the offence, does not constitute either a principal offence or an attempt or abetment of the same."<sup>1</sup> The accused were accordingly acquitted. As regards the first requirement it follows the well-established principle that " an act authorized by the law of the country in which it takes place, cannot be the subject of a legal proceeding here."<sup>2</sup> And as a person cannot be tried for a substantive offence, which is not penal under the law of the land, he cannot be tried for its abetment which follows the same rule.

Punishment of abetment if the act abetted is committed in consequence and where no express provision is made for its punishment.

109. Whoever abets any offence, shall if the act abetted is committed in consequence of the abetment and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment be punished with the punishment provided for the offence.

Explanation.—An act or offence is said to be committed in consequence of abetment, when it is committed in consequence of the instigation, or in pursuance of the conspiracy, or with the aid which constitutes the abetment.

Illustrations.

(a) A offers a bribe to B, a public servant, as a reward for showing A some favour in the exercise of B's official functions. B accepts the bribe. A has abetted the offence defined in section 161.

(b) A instigates B to give false evidence. B, in consequence of the instigation, commits that offence. A is guilty of abetting that offence, and is liable to the same punishment as B.

(c) A and B conspire to poison Z. A, in pursuance of the conspiracy, procures the poison and delivers it to B in order that he may administer it to Z. B, in pursuance of the conspiracy, administers the poison to Z in A's absence and thereby cause Z's death. Here B is guilty of murder. A is guilty of abetting that offence by conspiracy, and is liable to the punishment for murder.

1001. Analogous Law.—An offence under this section constitutes a substantive offence, and it may be so charged. And the procedure applicable is the same as if the offence abetted had been committed. So as regards the power of the police to arrest, it is provided that they " may arrest without warrant, if arrest for the offence abetted may be made without warrant, but not otherwise," the same test being applied where a warrant or summons is necessary and in matters as regards bail the compounding of offences, the competency of the Court trying the offence and the measure of punishment.<sup>4</sup>

1002. Procedure and Practice.—The procedure for the trial of abetment generally follows the procedure applicable to the trial of the offence abetted. Consequently an abetment is triable summarily, if the offence abetted was so triable.<sup>5</sup> An abettor may be tried jointly with the principal offender.<sup>6</sup> But where the principal offence cannot be inquired into except with the previous sanction or on the complaint of a public servant or a Court as required by section 195 of the Procedure Code, a similar sanction or complaint is not necessary to the cognizance of a case for abetment of those offences. This view proceeds upon the fact that though the abetment of an offence is an offence in itself, and is punishable under separate sections of its own, still none of these sections is mentioned in section 195 of the Procedure Code. " The fact that the Legislature has not included in section 195 the sections of the Penal Code relating to abetment is probably due to the circumstances that in the generality of cases the facts connected with the abetment are not likely to come before Court."<sup>1</sup> But as regards offences mentioned in section 198 of the Procedure Code, a complaint of the aggrieved party is necessary, even if the offence charged be an abetment.<sup>2</sup> Though having regard to the meaning of "offence" given in section 40, the term as here used would include an offence committed not only against the Code, but also under special or local law, still that term cannot be extended indefinitely to comprise rules that may have been framed under those laws.<sup>3</sup> A person found guilty of abetment of theft could not on the same facts be convicted of receiving stolen property,<sup>4</sup> nor could persons punished as principals be punished for abetment of the same offence.<sup>5</sup>

1003. Charge.—In a charge under this chapter, the section of the principal offence, and the section of this chapter under which the case falls should be mentioned with the circumstances which bring it under the said section.<sup>6</sup> A person cannot be convicted unless he is specifically charged under this section.<sup>7</sup>

1004. The offence of abetment falls through if the principal offence is not substantiated.<sup>8</sup> It is not competent to the appellate Court to alter the conviction for theft into one for its abetment under this section of which he was never charged.<sup>9</sup> Nor can a conviction under this section be altered to one under s. 471.<sup>10</sup>

1005. The charge may be worded as follows :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

"That A B (the name of the principal, if the person is unknown say that an unknown person) on the—day of—at—committed the offence of—, and that you at—abetted the said A B (or person unknown) in the commission of the said offence of—which was committed in consequence of your abetment and you have thereby committed an offence punishable under section 109 and—of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge (by the said Court if the case is committed to the Sessions)."

1006. When the abettor is charged with the principal offender, the charge should then run thus :—

"That you—on or about the—day of—at—abetted the commission of the offence of—by—which was committed in consequence of your abetment, and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under sections 109 and—of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of my Court (or the Court of Session)."

1007. This section only deals with a case of abetment in which no express provision is made by this Code. It therefore does not apply to the following sections which contain such express provisions :—

- Ss. 110-120 (specific sections on abetment).
- Ss. 121-123 (abetting the waging of war).
- S. 130 (abetting the escape of State prisoners).
- S. 132 (abetting mutiny).
- S. 134 (abetting assault of a soldier or sailor on his superior officer).
- S. 136 (abetting insubordination of the same).

1008. Principle.—Four things are considered in determining the criminality of the abettor: What act he had abetted and with what intention, and what act was committed and with what intention. If there was the identity of intention of the abettor and actor and the act was committed as it was abetted, then the liability of the abettor and the actor is equal. Such a case is met by the present section. But such complete union between two confederates is not always possible, and it may be that there may be a variation in act,<sup>1</sup> or intention<sup>2</sup> the effect produced,<sup>3</sup> or the encouragement given,<sup>4</sup> and again some discrimination is necessary between the abetment of heinous crimes such as murder, and those of a lesser kind. The remaining sections in this chapter consequently deal with the penalty involved in these variations. They, however, mainly relate to three facts following an abetment: (i) Where no offence is committed, in which case the offender is punished for what is a mere attempt to stir up crime (ss. 115, 116); (ii) where the act abetted is committed, in which case the offender is punished under ss. 109, 110; (iii) where some act different but naturally flowing from the act abetted is committed, in which case the abettor is punishable under ss. 111, 112 and 113.

1009. Meaning of Words.—“If the act abetted is committed”: The act means here the specific offence abetted. “No express provision,” as has been, for instance, made by the ensuing sections, and sections 121, 130, 132, 134, 136. “An act is—committed in consequence of abetment”. The words following paraphrase s. 107. “Punishment provided for the offence”: Under this code and not under any special or local law.<sup>5</sup>

1010. Abetment Followed by Act.—This section prescribes the penalty for abetment on commission of the act in consequence of the abetment. It excludes two classes of cases namely, (a) those in which the Code contains express provisions elsewhere, and (b) those in which the act abetted is committed but not in consequence of the abetment. The cases covered by express provisions have been already set out (§ 1007). In these cases the punishment will be that prescribed in those sections. In order, therefore, to see if this section applies, the Court has to first glance through the other sections hereby excluded, for this is a general provision and has no application so long as there are more specific sections applicable. If there are no such sections applicable, the question is then narrowed down to this: (i) What was the act abetted; (ii) what was the act committed, (iii) is the act committed the same as the act abetted; and (iv) was it committed in consequence of the abetment.

1011. As regards the first, the question is a question of fact which has to be sifted in the light of the rules discussed under sections 107 and 108. In order to establish the charge of abetment there must be evidence that an act was abetted, and that it was abetted by the person charged. The act abetted must, moreover, amount to a crime,<sup>6</sup> and in order to connect the abettor with the crime, it is not alone sufficient to prove that he has taken part in those steps of the transaction which are innocent, but that he had taken part in those steps of the transaction that are criminal.<sup>7</sup> Where, therefore, a person is charged with abetment of perjury, it is not only necessary to show that he had instigated another to make the statement which he did, but that in doing so he intended that those statements should be made falsely.<sup>8</sup> So where a person is charged with the abetment of forgery, it is not enough to show that he had taken part in the making of the document, but it must be shown that he knew that he was thereby promoting forgery. So where the accused wrote out a document purporting to be a kobala of one Khettar Nath Das then deceased, but to which no signature was affixed in his presence, it was held that the offence committed was one under this section, inasmuch as by his act he had abetted the commission of forgery whenever and by whomsoever it may have been committed.<sup>9</sup> So where a Hindu father after having given away in marriage his daughter, aged about 8, to one person, married her again to another, his act was held to amount to abetment within the meaning of this section.<sup>1</sup> It was contended in this case that as the girl was only aged 8, she had not the requisite knowledge and intelligence to commit an offence under section 494, and as there was no offence, there could be no abetment, but it was held that the case was amply covered by section 108, explanation 3, illustration (a).

1012. Sometimes the only indication of the act abetted will be found in the act done. So where the lessee of a house allowed gamblers to congregate therein, who caused an annoyance to the neighbourhood by their noise and disorderly conduct, it was held that the lessee was rightly convicted under this section read with section 290 of the Code, as the nuisance was caused in consequence of his turning his house into a common gaming house, which he could have anticipated.<sup>2</sup> So in the Himalayan Bank fraud case Edge, C. J., directed the jury to find the accused, Moses and Greenway, Manager and Accountant, guilty of abetment under this section if they came to the conclusion that they had assisted the directors of the Bank by the issue of false balance sheets to obtain the sanction of the shareholders to the paying of the dividends, and of the depositors to the retention of their deposits in the Bank.<sup>3</sup>

1013. A person may be charged of abetment under this section, though he may not have abetted the offence committed. Thus where A killed his wife in consequence of a quarrel, and he then called his brother B to assist him in disposing of her body to which he agreed and for which purpose he accompanied him, A asked him to carry his child C which he did, and while on the way he asked him what he intended to do with the child, and A replied that he should either kill him or abandon him in the jungle. B thereupon continued to carry the child and, after proceeding with it some distance, declined to proceed any further. He then left the child with A and left him to call his brother who was in the neighbouring field, whom he sent to A, himself returning home. A killed C, and it was held that B was liable as an abettor both under this and section 111, his abetment consisting in the fact that after he had known of his brother's murderous intention he continued to carry the child and left him with A, in consequence of which he was killed.<sup>4</sup> In this case the abettor had the means of knowing the nature of the act committed, for the commission of which he offered facilities. He was, therefore, rightly convicted of abetment.

1014. The question in these cases is, was the act committed the same as the act abetted. This question is answered in section 111, under which it will have to be discussed. Here, however, it may be stated that the test in such cases is, was the act done such as the abettor knew was the probable consequence of his abetment. If so, he is liable in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had himself directly authorized the act. For the purpose of determining the identity of the offence committed with that abetted, it is not necessary that the two offences should be called by the same name, provided that they are otherwise identical. Where, for instance, a woman A volunteered to become a sutti, and A ordered her pile to be lighted, whereupon A fled, but B induced her to return, it was held that though A was guilty of attempted suicide, B was liable for abetment of homicide.<sup>5</sup>

1015. Abetment : Kidnapping.—Sometimes a person's liability for abetment may depend upon the stage at which his assistance was given. If he had assisted after the offence was already complete, his assistance ex post facto could not amount to abetment (§ 1016). If the offence was, on the other hand, a continuing one, abetment is in such a case still possible. For example, take the offence of kidnapping punishable under section 363 of the Code. It is now agreed that kidnapping could not be so regarded.<sup>1</sup> consequently, there cannot be abetment of kidnapping by an act subsequent to the removal of the minor out of the custody of his guardian, since the offence does not continue so long as the minor is kept out of such guardianship.

1016. Offence Committed must be Consequential.—The same rule extends to other offences. A person cannot be convicted

Explanation. of the abetment of theft merely on the ground that he had subsequent knowledge of the offence.<sup>2</sup> This is clear from the meaning assigned to the term abetment in section 107 and to the fact that this section contemplates that the act abetted should be committed in consequence of the abetment.<sup>3</sup> Now, how is it to be known that an act was committed in consequence of the abetment? According to the Explanation, an act would be deemed to be so committed if it is committed (a) in consequence of the instigation, or (b) in pursuance of the conspiracy, or (c) with the aid which constitutes the abetment. These three clauses, it will be noticed, closely follow the three corresponding clauses of section 107, to which reference must be made for the meaning of the terms here employed (§§ 954-982). The questions that call for discussion here are, when are the acts committed to be deemed to be done in consequence of the instigation, in pursuance of the conspiracy, or with the aid of that act constituting abetment.

1017. In ordinary cases it is not difficult to trace an effect to its cause. A tells B to strike C, B strikes C. The assault on C is, of course, in consequence of the instigation of A. This is, however, the case of direct instigation, but there are cases in which the influence of instigation is left to inference. Such inference may be drawn not only from the acts and conduct of the abettor, prior to the commission of the act, but also his contemporaneous and subsequent conduct in reference to the transaction. For instance, if a person stands by while a crime is being committed by the other, he may be either a spectator or an accomplice. But, if suppose, he came and left with the actual perpetrator, would not the inference be strong that he was an abettor?<sup>4</sup> So again there may be circumstances when such an inference may be drawn from a mere standing by. Suppose a gentleman's house is being robbed at night and two men armed with sticks are found watching at the gate. Could they be regarded as mere spectators? And could they be regarded as otherwise than spectators, if they happened to be respectable neighbours who had probably been attracted by the sound of burglars? Where certain persons pointed out to the dacoits the houses to be robbed, and took charge of the camels of the dacoits whilst the dacoity was being committed, it was held to be a case of abetment under this section.<sup>5</sup> The question, in each case, is then a question of fact depending upon the proved facts and circumstances of each case.

1018. No Offence, No Abetment.—It is clear from the language of this section that there can be no abetment of an offence which is non-existent. A case in point is that of the accused who having been prosecuted by a Sergeant had been convicted of a small offence under the Motor Car Act, but oblivious of which fact he offered him Re. 1 for the withdrawal of the charge. It was held that he could not be convicted for abetment of the offence of bribery.<sup>6</sup> The liability of a person for abetment must be distinguished from his responsibility as a co-offender. Where the accused merely said "Beat" but took no further part in the consequent assault, he was held liable for no more than the abetment of assault under ss. 352 and 109.<sup>7</sup>

110. Whoever abets the commission of an offence shall, if the person abetted does the act with a different intention or knowledge from that of the abettor, be punished with the punishment provided for the offence which would have been committed if the act had been done with the intention or knowledge of the abettor and with no other.

1019. Analogous Law.—This section refers to a case contemplated in section 198, explanation 3, of which illustration (d) furnishes a concrete example.

This section applies equally to offences under special or local laws.

1020. Procedure.—With reference to this section, it is provided by the Code of Criminal Procedure that the police may arrest without warrant if they could have done so for the offence abetted. So ordinarily, a warrant or summons will issue in the first instance according as a warrant or summons may issue for the offence abetted. The offence is bailable and compoundable if the offence abetted be bailable and compoundable. The same test applies to the jurisdiction of the Court trying the case.<sup>1</sup>

1021. Principle.—As remarked before, the law of abetment takes note of four things: (a) the act abetted, (b) the act done, (c) the intention of the abettor, and (d) of the actor. The last section presents a case in which there is no variation between the abetment and the act, and this section supplements the provisions of that section by enacting that a variation between the intention and knowledge of the abettor is immaterial so long as the act done is the same as the act abetted. Where even the act is different the rules formulated in the next section would have then to be called into requisition. So far as this section is concerned, it makes it inconsequential that the person abetted had an incentive of his own or no incentive at all for committing the act. He had committed it in consequence of the abetment, and his abettor must take upon his shoulders all the blame that attaches to the offence. It was he that had moved the hand of the other, and the presumption is that it would not have moved otherwise. His responsibility is, therefore, single and undivided. This does not mean that the person abetted is thereby rendered free from punishment. His liability as an offender still remains, and will be measured by the enormity of his crime and the criminality of his intention. If he was an innocent agent, then respondeat superior. If a particeps criminis, then he must suffer as much as his mentor.

1022. Offence Committed with Different Intention.—As no man can be punished for his evil intentions, so no man can be held liable if his act was prompted by his own intention provided that it was the act abetted by another. If, therefore, A orders B to kill C, and B kills him because he has a malice of his own against C, A is liable to the same extent as if B's act was due to the malice of A. So A asks a railway porter B to remove a certain luggage from the train, and the porter removes it believing it to be A's but which A intended to steal; he is liable for abetment of B's theft, though B being an innocent agent is not liable for his own act.

111. When an act is abetted and a different act is done, the abettor is liable for the act done, on the same manner and to same extent as if he had directly abetted it:

Liability of abettor when one act abetted and different act done.

Provided that the act done was a probable consequence of the abetment, and was committed under the influence of the instigation, or with the aid or in pursuance of the conspiracy which constituted the abetment.

Illustrations.

(a) A instigates a child to put poison into the food of Z, and gives him poison for that purpose. The child, in consequence of the instigation, by mistake puts the poison into the food of Y, which is by the side of that of Z. Here, if the child was acting under the influence of A's instigation, and the act done was under the circumstances a probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had instigated the child to put the poison into the food of Y.

(b) A instigates B to burn Z's house. B sets fire to the house and at the same time commits theft of property there. A, though guilty of abetting the burning of the house, is not guilty of abetting the theft; for the theft was a distinct act, and not a probable consequence of the burning.

(c) A instigates B and C to break into an inhabited house at midnight for the purpose of robbery, and provides them with arms for that purpose. B and C break into the house, and being resisted by Z, one of the inmates, murder Z. Here, if that murder was the probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable to the punishment provided for murder.

1023. Analogous Law.—This statement of the law coincides with the English view. So Foster laid down the following rules: "If the principal totally and substantially varies: if solicited to commit felony of one kind, he wilfully and knowingly commits a felony of another, he will stand single in that offence, and the person soliciting will not be involved in his guilt. But if the principal in substance complies with the command, varying only in the circumstances of time or place or manner of execution in these cases the person soliciting to commit the offence will, if absent, be an accessory before the fact, or if present, a principal. A commands B to murder C by poison; B does it by sword or other weapon, or by some other means; A is accessory to this murder, for the murder of C was the principal object, and that object is effected. So where the principal goes beyond the terms of the solicitation, if in the event the felony committed was the probable consequence of what was ordered or advised, the person giving such order or advice will be an accessory to that felony. A, upon some affront given by B, ordered his servant to waylay him and beat him. His servant does so, and B dies of the beating; A is accessory to this murder. A solicits B to burn the house of C; he does so, and the flames catch the house of D, which also is burnt. A is accessory to this felony. The principle in all these cases is, that though the event might be beyond the original intention of the accessory, yet as in the ordinary course of things, that event was the probable consequence of what was done under his influence, and at his instigation, he is in law answerable for the offence."<sup>1</sup>

1024. Illustration (a) follows the view of Sir Michael Foster and dissents from that of Hale, in a case in which he held that, if A ordered B to kill C, and B by mistake killed D but missed C, A was not accessory to the murder of C, because the person was different. Sir Michael Foster animadverts on this view, holding that the order was to commit murder and the fact that a wrong person was murdered was no exoneration of the crime.<sup>2</sup>

1025. This view is enacted in the section, and illustration (a) shows that the view adopted by the Legislature is that commended by Foster and is opposed to that of Lord Hale.

1026. Procedure.—The procedure in an offence under this section is the same as in the case of the offence abetted.

1027. Principle.—It is a rule of acknowledged authority that a man is responsible for the probable consequences of his own acts.<sup>3</sup> No man can say that he did not authorize an act when he could have foreseen that consequence. If he did not, he might and ought to have foreseen it, and he is liable to the same extent as if in fact he had foreseen it. If the rule were otherwise, Criminal law would be more compassionate to felons than civil law is to those who employ agents. The rule, therefore, has always been that those who employ agents to perpetrate crimes must bear the brunt of liability for all acts done by the agent so long as the agent has not substantially varied from the terms of the abetment.

1028. Meaning of Words.—“The act done was the probable consequence of the abetment”: This means the same thing as that the act done was in consequence of the substantial compliance of the abetment. “And was committed,” that is to say, that the act was done in consequence of the abetment.<sup>1</sup>

1029. Limits of Vicarious Liability.—Following the rule of English Law (§ 1024), this section defines the limits of the abettor's responsibility for effects produced in consequence of his abetment. Criminal law regards the criminal abettor at least as much responsible for his act as civil law makes one responsible for delegated authority. The rule here enacted makes the abettor liable for all acts of the person abetted provided that they were performed in consequence of the abetment and were its probable consequence. For instance, A orders B to burn C's house, and he in so doing commits a robbery; now A, though accessory to the burning, is not accessory to the robbery, for that is a thing of distinct and inconsequential nature.<sup>2</sup> So if A counsels B to steal goods of C on the road, and B breaks into C's house and steals them there, A is not accessory to the house-breaking, because it is a felony of another kind.<sup>3</sup> He is, however, accessory to the stealing.<sup>4</sup> But if in such a case A had counselled B to steal goods in C's house, and he broke into it, A would be accessory to the breaking, for it was only incident to trespass.<sup>5</sup> (§ 957). But a person abetting robbery is not, according to Straight, J., liable for the excessive violence therein used, which culminated in the death of the person robbed.<sup>6</sup> That decision so far as it may have been founded upon the facts of that case may be right, but it is no authority for enunciating a general rule that an abettor of robbery is not liable for murder if it is committed in consequence. Indeed, in abetting robbery, the abettor authorizes the use of such force as will suffice to overcome resistance. Could it be then said that the abettor has no reason to believe that it may lead to murder, and if so, why should he not be responsible for it? At any rate this is the view taken by Sir Michael Foster. (§ 1023).

1030. At the same time Sir Douglas Straight is perfectly right in counselling strict and close construction of the highly penal provisions of this section.<sup>7</sup> He is also right in saying that the test

True Test. in these cases must always be, whether, having regard to the immediate object of the instigation of conspiracy, the act done by the principal is one which, according to ordinary experience and common sense, the abettor must have foreseen as probable. The determination of this question as to the state of a man's mind at a particular moment must necessarily always be a matter of serious difficulty, and conclusions should not be formed without the most anxious and careful scrutiny of all the facts. These observations may be applied to the facts of the case which were these. A had obtained a decree against B for a sum of money which B reluctantly paid, but which he was anxious to recover. B put up with A and conspired with certain robbers to rob A while he was on his way, of which he gave the robbers information. A was not only robbed but murdered. B was held an abettor of murder.<sup>8</sup> Where, however, a Head Constable having arrested one Kurpa Sahu on a charge of illicit possession of country liquor promised to release him on payment of a bribe, to procure which Kurpa Sahu was sent in charge of two Chowkidars, who for that purpose beat and confined him, it was held that the maltreatment of which the accused were guilty could not be said to have been abetted by the Head Constable.<sup>9</sup> The question what was the probable expectation of the abettor in a given case, of course, depends upon the circumstances of each case. If a person abets one merely to beat another, it may be safely inferred that the amount of hurt he thereby sanctions, is simple or grievous hurt, but it would be extending too far the liability of the abettor to hold him liable if murder is the consequence.<sup>1</sup>

1031. In such a case a good deal, though not all, depends upon the intention of the abettor and the nature of the act abetted.<sup>2</sup> Where, for instance, three soldiers went together to rob an orchard, and two got upon a pear-tree, and the third stood at the gate with a drawn sword in his hand; and the owner's son coming by collared him and asked him what business he had there, whereupon the soldier stabbed him, it was held that only the soldier who stabbed was guilty of murder, the other two being innocent. It was considered that they had come to commit a small inconsiderable trespass, and the murder was committed upon a sudden affray without their knowledge, and that they could not, therefore, be held liable as abettors.<sup>3</sup> But it would have been different if they had gone to steal with a general resolution against all-comers, in which case the murder, would have been committed in prosecution of their original purpose (§§ 966-967). Indeed, where persons start with a general resolution against all-comers, whether such resolutions appears evidence to have been actually or explicitly entered into by the confederates, or may be reasonably collected from their number, arms or behaviour, at or before the scene of action, and homicide is committed by any of the party, every person present in the sense of the law when the homicide is committed will be involved in the guilt of him that gave the mortal blow.<sup>4</sup> The question then does not necessarily depend upon the abettor's intention. If the act was the probable consequence of the abetment he is liable, whatever may have been his intention. Suppose, for instance, A orders B to take a loaded gun and rob C, whom he has seen proceed on his way armed with a sword. A counsels B not to murder C, B attacks him, and is met with resistance, whereupon he kills him. Here A had not intended to abet the murder of C, but he knew that from the way that B and C were armed, that murder may probably be the consequence. A is, therefore, liable for abetment of the murder of C.

112. If the act for which the abettor is liable under the last preceding section is committed in addition to the act abetted, and constitutes a distinct offence, the abettor is liable to punishment for each of the offences.

Abettor when liable to cumulative punishment for act abetted and for act done.

Illustration.

A instigates B to resist by force a distress made by a public servant. B, in consequence resists that distress. In offering the resistance, B voluntarily causes grievous hurt to the officer executing the distress. As B has committed both the offence of resisting the distress and the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, B is liable to punishment for both these offences, and if A knew that B was likely voluntarily to cause grievous hurt in resisting the distress, A will also be liable to punishment for each of the offences.

1032. Analogous Law.—Obviously, this section does not override the provisions of section 71, under which a person cannot be separately punished for what are the parts of the same offence. The provision for cumulative punishment made in this section was explained by the Law Commissioners to vary from the English Law<sup>5</sup> “in making the abettor liable to cumulative punishment if the intended offence be also committed according to the principle of this Code.”<sup>6</sup>

1033. The words “knew to be likely to be committed” in the original section were objected to,<sup>7</sup> which necessitated the change of language. Appended to the draft section there were two illustrations, one of which, since omitted, ran as follows :—

“(a) B, with arms, breaks into an inhabited house at midnight, for the purpose of robbery. A watches at the door. B being resisted by Z, one of the inmates, murders Z. Here if A considered murder as likely to be committed by B in the attempt to rob the house, or in the robbing of the house, or in consequence of the robbing of the house, A is liable to the punishment provided for murder.”

1034. Principle.—The section extends the doctrine of constructive criminality beyond the recognized limits of English Law<sup>1</sup> (§ 1032). But in holding the abettor liable to the punishment of a different offence which may be committed in consequence of his abetment of the intended offence if he knew that such different offence was likely to be committed in the attempt to commit the intended offence, the section only pushes to its logical consequence the rule enacted in the last section.

1036. Cumulative Offences.—This section materially enlarges the liability of the abettor to punishment both for the offence actually abetted as well as that which was a probable consequence of the abetment, provided that the two offences were “distinct” (§ 493), that is to say, if they were such in which cumulative sentences might be legally passed. It has already been seen as to what offences are to be considered “distinct” for this purpose (§§ 489-491). As that list is fairly full, all that need to be said here is, that if the person abetted commits not only the act abetted but also another act as a probable consequence of the abetment, and by reason thereof, the abettor may be punished for both, if such punishment would be otherwise legal. This provision does not affect the abettor’s liability aliunde, as if in addition to abetting a theft by house-breaking, he receives stolen property, in which case he may be charged for the house-breaking and theft under this section, and for receiving stolen property independently of it.

113. When an act is abetted with the intention, on the part of the abettor, of causing a particular effect, and an act, for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, causes a different effect from that intended by the abettor, the abettor is liable for the effect caused, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had abetted the act with the intention of causing that effect, provided he knew that the act abetted was likely to cause that effect.

1037. Analogous Law.—This section is complementary to s. 111 from which its provisions are, however, distinguishable upon grounds stated in the next article.

1038. Principle.—This section supplements the provisions of the last section which deals with the doing of a different act to the act abetted, while this section deals with a case where the act done is the same as the act abetted, but its effect is different. The liability of the abettor is also, consequently, in the two cases different. In the first case, his liability for his constructive act depends upon the determination of the question whether the act done is a probable consequence of the abetment. In this case, his liability depends upon his “knowledge of the likelihood of the effect.” The measure of criminal responsibility in a case arising under s. 111 is the probability of the consequence, but the measure in a case arising under this section is not the probability but the knowledge of the likelihood of the effect produced. An act may be probable without the abettor knowing it likely; on the other hand, the abettor may know it is likely and yet the effect may not be probable. Knowledge is subjective while probability is objective. In one sense, one cannot be said to possess knowledge of a future contingency (§§ 227, 311, 312). But, as elsewhere explained, knowledge merely includes a higher degree of belief founded upon the accumulated experience of the past, that the effect was likely under the given circumstances. Both s. 111 and this section depend upon warrantable inference; only in a case under this section, the facts warranting the inference must be stronger.

1039. Meaning of Words.—“With the intention of causing a particular effect,” which intention must necessarily be communicated to the principal. “An act for which the abettor is liable”: Could this include a case under section 111? If so, the abettor will be liable both for his constructive act as well as for its adventitious effect (§§ 1029-1031). “Provided he knew that the act abetted was likely”: for the meaning of which see s. 39.

1040. Abettor's Liability for Likely Effect.—The distinction between this and section 111 has been already considered (§ 1038). That section appears to deal with abetment in which the abetment consists of the act to be done and not of the effect to be produced. The act done may, indeed, invariably thus produce the effect, but the production of the effect is neither directly intended nor necessarily expressed. Under this section, however, the abettor has an object in view and he abets the principal to attain that object and not to go beyond. This section defines his liability if the principal in attaining one result produces another which the abettor may, or may never, have bargained for. But as the primary author of the mischief, he is not wholly irresponsible for the effect produced, though he should not be taken by surprise. He is, therefore, declared liable only in case he knew that the effect produced was likely. This section does not necessarily exclude a case under s. 111, as it is conceivable that the act done may both be the probable consequence of the abetment as well as cause the effects which the abettor knew was likely. Suppose, for instance, that A orders B to take a loaded gun and waylay C and rob him. C was armed with a sword and A cautions B on no account to kill him unless to save himself. B attacks C, whereupon C draws his sword, B then fires and kills C and robs him. Here A is liable both under section 111 as well as this section, in as much as A knew that C's murder was probable. He also knew that though he wanted B only to rob C, still B was likely to kill him if he was resisted, and which C was likely to do.

1041. Of course, neither section 111 nor this section contemplates that the act abetted or the effect caused should be merely an attempt. Prima facie any violence to another would fall under one of two categories, viz., to cause death, or hurt, whether grievous or simple.<sup>1</sup>

114. Whenever any person, who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor, is present when the act or offence for which he would be punishable in consequence of the abetment is committed, he shall be deemed to have committed such act or offence.

1042. Analogous Law.—This section deals with what is known in English Law as accession at the fact, or principal in the second degree (§ 944). An abettor who is present at the time of the commission of the crime is, in the eye of the law, regarded as an actual perpetrator of the crime, though, as a matter of fact, the offence was committed by another person altogether. In this respect this section is somewhat wider than section 34 which defines the joint liability of persons acting in “furtherance of the common intention of all.” An instigator working through an innocent agent would not be liable under section 34. He is liable under this section. Section 34 deals with the case of conspiracy which is not the only form of abetment dealt with in this section.

1043. It will be observed that an abettor present at the fact is not now regarded as an abettor under English Law. He becomes a principal in the second degree. In this respect the section differs, for even though present and punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as the principal offender, he does not thereby cease to be an abettor and assume the character of principal. The difference then between the two systems is merely verbal.

1045. Principle.—A person who abets is not so great an offender as one who abets and is present at the scene of offence. Between him and the actual perpetrator there is nothing to discriminate. To the one there remained at any rate, the locus pœnitentiæ, to the other there remains nothing. He is indistinguishable from the actual offenders: he ceases to be a mere abettor and becomes liable for the offence abetted.

1046. Meaning of Words.—“Who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor.” i.e., whose offence of abetment is otherwise complete.<sup>1</sup> “Is present,” not necessarily during the whole of the transaction, nor necessarily as an eye or ear witness. If a thief is inside the house committing theft and his confederate is standing outside watching, he is present at the theft. The presence required is at the time when the act abetted is committed. His presence at any other time will not be enough to charge him with the same liability. “The act in consequence of the abetment is committed,” for the meaning of which see s. 109, explanation (§§ 1010, 1016). “He shall be deemed to have committed such offence”: The words “shall be deemed” imply that the change of status is only by way of legal fiction—not that he actually commits the offence he is present at,<sup>2</sup> though he is liable for the offence abetted.<sup>3</sup>

1047. Liability of Present Abettor.—In point of culpability Law discriminates between an absent abettor, and one who is present at the fact. The one is not guilty in the same degree as the other. Indeed, between a person who both abets and countenances the crime by his presence, and one who actually engages in it there is no difference. The one is as culpable as the other, and in England both are regarded as principals, the actual perpetrator being designated a principal in the first degree, the abettor being called principal in the second degree. There being no degrees of principal in the Code, both are here declared to be equally culpable, and so far as the abettor is concerned “he shall be deemed to have committed” the offence of which he was both an abettor and a witness. The words “shall be deemed” do not however mean that the abettor’s status is completely merged into that of the principal. Nor is he a principal in any case. He is only regarded as a principal for the purpose of punishment.<sup>4</sup> Consequently, his conviction for the principal offence read with this section would amount to a previous conviction “for an offence punishable under Chapter XII or Chapter XVII of the Code,” for the purpose of enhanced punishment under s. 75.<sup>5</sup>

1048. Proof.—Now, in order to create even the legal fiction of this section, it is essential to establish that (i) the person was an abettor (§ 1049) and that as such (ii) he was liable to be punished, even if absent from the scene of offence

(§ 1054); (iii) it is then to be shown that the abettor had aggravated his crime by being even present there.<sup>1</sup> (§§ 1052-1053).

1049. Previous Abetment Necessary.—The first requisite of an offence under this section is that the person should have been a previous abettor of the offence.<sup>2</sup> If he was not an abettor, his mere presence is insignificant. For he may be a bystander. And even where the mere presence amounts to abetment (§§ 952, 953), a person present may be dealt with as an abettor but he cannot be proceeded against under this section as well. For, if absent, he would not be liable to be punished as an abettor. A policeman present and doing nothing to prevent a prisoner being tortured has been held to be an abettor, by the very fact of his presence. Consequently, he cannot be punished under this section, for if he were absent he would not have been punishable as an abettor. So again, where no instigation, conspiracy or act or illegal omission is proved, and the abetment consists only of participation in the actual commission of the offence, section 109 and not this section is applicable.<sup>3</sup> Such a case arises where persons yield to sudden temptation, as where they join in a riotous crowd seeing them commit plunder.

1050. It has already been observed that the mere presence of a person at the commission of a crime does not condemn him to the liability of an abettor (§§ 952-953). This is true not only of a person innocent of the crime as of one who had otherwise abetted it. A person who is present and joins with others in committing a crime may be either an abettor or a principal. But, if an abettor, he cannot be punished under this section. If, for instance, several persons join together in beating a man, and one of them actually causes grievous hurt, he will be guilty of an offence under section 325, but others who have assisted him by their presence and encouragement cannot merely on that account be punished under this section.<sup>4</sup> So where the five accused illegally rescued one Dhunuk from the lawful custody of the police, who had arrested him for causing grievous hurt, and who to effect that purpose beat the Sub-Inspector so as to cause him grievous hurt, the question was whether the mere joining in beating the Police Sub-Inspector rendered them liable to punishment under this section, and it was held that it did not, for in addition to showing that they were present when the beating took place, there must have been given evidence to show that whether by conspiracy, intentional aiding or instigation by illegal act or omission they had already abetted the assault before they took part in it.<sup>5</sup> So where seven persons joined in mortgaging a piece of land to another, at the time of the registration the two accused falsely personated two of the mortgagors and affixed false signatures to the registration indorsements. One of the mortgagors was then present, and he was prosecuted for abetment, but it was held that there being no presumption of common dishonest intention, or evidence of previous abetment his mere presence as a silent witness of the fraud was not an illegal omission rendering him liable as an abettor of any offence committed by the personators.<sup>6</sup> So the mere presence of a person on the occasion of the giving of a bribe, and his omission to promptly inform the authorities does not constitute him an accomplice, unless it is shown that he somehow co-operated in the payment of the bribe, or was instrumental in the negotiation for its payment.<sup>1</sup>

1051. It is thus apparent that no one can be convicted of a constructive offence under this section, unless, he is shown to have been first an abettor, and then present at the commission of the offence. Such previous abetment may, of course, be proved or inferred by his subsequent co-operation, but this is not the invariable rule. Suppose, for instance, that a number of thieves enter a house at night and while they are looting it, one of the men stands outside the house to watch; is it not reasonable to suppose that he was a co-conspirator, and that he was watching in pursuance of that conspiracy? In such a case his mere presence is sufficient to prove previous abetment, and he may, therefore, be legitimately convicted under this section of abetment of the offence which the thieves within may have committed.<sup>2</sup> But now suppose that in such a case the latter commit murder whilst committing the theft; could the gate-keeper be punished as an abettor of murder under this section. No: because (a) there is no evidence of previous abetment of murder, and (b) because he was not present at it (§ 1052).

1052. When is an Abettor Present.—This raises the question when is a person “present” at the commission of the offence which he has abetted. In the last example the man at the gate was not actually present inside the house, and yet he was held to be liable as one so present. The word “present” does not, therefore, necessarily mean present as an ear or eye-witness of the transaction; he is in the eye of the law present, if he is near enough to afford assistance, should occasion arise.<sup>3</sup> The word “present” has been, therefore, used in its legal and not literal sense as meaning sufficiently near to render assistance.<sup>4</sup> A strict actual immediate presence, such a presence as would make one an eye or ear-witness of what passes, is not then required. Constructive presence is enough, if it was such as may be inferred as due to a common design and intended to achieve a common purpose, and if it is sufficiently near to afford to the other confederates sufficient aid and encouragement. So that if several persons set out together, or in small parties, upon one common design, be it murder or some other felony or for any other purpose unlawful in itself, and each takes the part assigned to him, some to commit the fact, others to watch at proper distances and stations to prevent a surprise or to favour, if need be, the escape of those who are more immediately engaged; they are all, in the eye of the law, present at it; provided the fact be committed, for it was made a common cause with them; each man operated in his station at one and the same instant, towards the same common end, and the part each man took tended to give countenance, encouragement, and protection to the whole gang, and to insure the success of their common enterprise.<sup>5</sup>

1053. Such is the case where one commits theft in a house and throws the stolen property to an accomplice posted outside to receive it,<sup>6</sup> or where a pick-pocket steals and throws the stolen article to another who disappears with it.<sup>7</sup> Consequently, it is not even necessary that the confederate should have been present during the whole of the transaction. Such was the case of the two prisoners Kelly and McCarty<sup>8</sup> who were indicted for stealing oats, the facts of which have been given elsewhere (§ 966). There the two had conspired to steal their employer's oats, and McCarthy put them in a place from where Kelly afterwards removed them. Kelly was not present when McCarthy put them under Kelly's train; McCarthy was not present when Kelly removed them; still Maule, J., said: "I think the evidence shows that this was all one transaction in which both concurred; and I think that having concurred and both being present at some parts of the transaction, both may be convicted,"<sup>1</sup> and they were both convicted as principals. Where, however, the abettor was at such a distance from the theft as not to be able to assist, he was held not to be "present" aiding and abetting the theft. So where A and B went to steal two horses and A left B half a mile from the scene of theft, and where he brought the two horses stolen, when both went away with them. It was held that B could not be held to have been present at A's theft.<sup>2</sup> The same view was taken in another case in which the servant had left the door open to let in the thieves and then left the premises twenty minutes before the thief came.<sup>3</sup> So where three men were indicted for wounding the prosecutor and it appeared that one of them, the prisoner, only came up after the wound had been inflicted, it was held that he was only an abettor not present at the fact, though it appeared that the prisoner had kicked the prosecutor several times after he came up.<sup>4</sup> So if two start to commit theft, and one of them be apprehended as soon as he enters the house, he was held not to be present when the other entered afterwards and committed the theft.<sup>5</sup>

1054. Community of Purpose Essential.—It has been remarked before that the mere presence of the abettor at the fact does not make him liable to the enhanced penalty prescribed by this section (§ 1050).

1055. An abettor must not only be present, but he must have been present as an abettor of the offence committed, which implies that his abetment must continue down to the time of the commission of the offence. An abettor may at any time before that event change his mind, and withdraw from the abetment. The law allows a locus pœnitentiæ in such cases; and if he distinctly withdraws at any moment before the final act is done, he cannot be held liable as an abettor present at the fact.<sup>6</sup> Examples have already been given of cases in which an abettor though liable for abetment of one offence was not held liable for the commission of a wholly different offence, though committed in his presence (§ 957). So it has been elsewhere provided by the Code that "if an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every person who, at the time of the committing of that offence is a member of the same assembly is guilty of that offence."<sup>7</sup> Both under this as well as under section 149 of the Code, the presence of the abettor at the fact and the community of purpose are essential. Indeed, it will sometimes be a question whether a given case falls under this section or under section 149. The two sections present some common features but at the same time they materially differ both as to their applicability as well as in the after-effects of the resultant conviction, for while a conviction under this section does not count as a previous conviction one under section 149 undoubtedly does for the purpose of enhanced punishment under section 75.<sup>8</sup>

1056. A case under section 149 arises only when the persons composing the unlawful assembly are at least five persons. There is of course no such limit fixed for an abetment under this section.

This Section and Section 149 Compared.

A person under section 149 need not be "present" at the time of the committing of the offence—it is sufficient if he was then a member of the "unlawful assembly" which committed that offence. Under this section his presence is essential. Both sections, however, deal with constructive criminality, and in both cases the object is to punish abettors whose assistance is extended to the time of the commission of the offence. When their number is or exceeds five, law takes a more serious view of their conduct, and regards them all as principals, and punishable as such, irrespective of their individual contribution to the violence used or of the offence committed. It would thus appear that rioters are then all liable to be convicted as principals, and there can be no abetment of a riot within the meaning of this section, though it is quite conceivable that rioters may be even further liable to be punished under this section if in addition to rioting they had abetted any other offence which might be committed by the mob under their orders or instigation, or in prosecution of the common object.<sup>1</sup>

(8) This difference is due to the difference in the language of the two sections. A person under the section is only "deemed to have committed" the other offence, while section 149 declares him "guilty of that offence."

1057. Then again the section has no application where the abettor is not only present, but takes part in the commission of the offence. So where a blow is struck by A in the presence of, and by the order of B, there is no question of abetment, for both are principals in the transaction, in the same way as if the two had actually joined in the beating, in which case both would be held jointly responsible for the effect their beating had produced upon their victim.<sup>2</sup> In such cases law apportions the individual responsibility of offenders, if it can, but where this is not possible, it holds them all jointly responsible for the consequence.

1058. Confession of Co-accused.—Though an abettor may be legally tried jointly with the principal offender, it was formerly held that as the abettor was not tried jointly with him for the same offence, a confession made by him was not admissible in evidence against his co-accused.<sup>3</sup> This view was perfectly logical on section 30 of the Indian Evidence Act as it then stood, though even then the tendency was to strain the point in favour of their admissibility, for the Courts could not afford to lose so good an evidence. It was consequently laid down in some cases that a present abettor, tried conjointly with another, was really being tried for the same offence so that the confession of one was admissible against the other.<sup>4</sup> The amendment of the section in 1891<sup>5</sup> has now legalized this view, as the word “offence” as used in that section is enacted to include the abetment of, or attempt to commit the offence.

115. Whoever abets the commission of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life, shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine ; and if any act for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, and which causes hurt to any person, is done, the abettor shall be liable to imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and shall also be liable to fine.

A instigates B to murder Z. The offence is not committed. If B had murdered Z, he would have been subject to the punishment of death or transportation for life. Therefore A is liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and also to a fine; and, if any hurt be done to Z in consequence of the abetment, he will be liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and to fine.

(5) Act III of 1891.

1059. Analogous Law.—This and the next section deal with abetment not otherwise provided for. In both cases the abetment is abortive and does not result in the commission of the offence abetted. These two sections were added since the original draft. They supplement the provisions of section 109 which prescribes the penalty of the abettor “if the act abetted is committed in consequence.” This section provides for the abetment of more heinous crimes in which the offence abetted is either not committed at all, or is only partially committed, or if committed, it is not in consequence of the abetment.

1060. Charge.—An offence under this section may be charged as follows :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate or Judge) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you, on or about the——day of——at——abetted the commission by one A B of an offence of——punishable with death (or transportation for life), which said offence was not committed in consequence of the abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 115 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge [ by the said Court (in the case of committal to the Sessions) ].”

1061. Procedure.—The offence under this section is non-bailable : otherwise the offence is cognizable and compoundable, if the offence abetted is cognizable and compoundable ; and it is triable by the same Magistrate as the offence abetted.

1062. Principle.—It is, of course, by no means an essential ingredient of the offence of abetment that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect intended should be produced.<sup>1</sup> Such abetment being ineffectual is naturally deserving of lenient punishment. Such would be the case where the accused gave aconite to a woman to win the love of her husband, in consequence of which two persons, other than the husband, died. He was held guilty under ss. 302/115.<sup>2</sup>

1063. Meaning of Words.—“ Express provision,” that is for the punishment of the offences of abetment punishable with death or transportation, e.g., s. 121 ; of course, an offence under s. 117 is not such an offence.<sup>3</sup>

116. Whoever abets an offence punishable with imprisonment shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term provided for that offence, or with such fine as is provided for that offence, or with both ;

and if the abettor or the person abetted is a public servant, whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence, the abettor shall be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the longest term provided for that offence, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

1064. Analogous Law.—This section is really a continuation of the last, the two together exhausting abetment not followed up by the offence abetted.

1065. Principle.—This section discriminates between the peace-officers and the public, the abetment of the former being regarded as doubly penal. The reason for this difference is obvious. If the public incur no greater liability for tampering with those whose duty it is to prevent crime, it will be difficult to maintain that high standard of integrity and honesty which it is in the interest of the public that peace-officers should possess. The enhanced penalty, it will be observed, applies only to public servants “whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence.” Other public servants fall into the general category.

1066. Meaning of Words.—“Abets an offence punishable with imprisonment,” i.e., as a substantive and not as an alternative sentence. Offences punishable with fine only are thus excluded, though the sentence of imprisonment would even then be awarded in default of payment of fine. “Offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment,” for the meaning of which see s. 109 (§ 1016). “No express provision made,” e.g., ss. 121-123, 130, 132, 134 and 136. “Whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence,” e.g., a civil surgeon is a public servant, but he is not a public servant qualified to prevent the commission of such offences.<sup>1</sup>

1067. Abortive Abetment.—An abetment that fails in its purpose is not visited in law by the same rigour as one which fulfils its purpose. Such a case may arise not only when no offence is committed in consequence of the crime, but also when the offence committed is not the offence abetted, though it may be more heinous, but inasmuch as the abettor cannot be held accountable for it, it is not the full measure of his responsibility. But inasmuch as such an abetment may have led, though distantly, to the commission of that crime, it is laid down that he shall be liable to one-fourth of the punishment provided for the offence he had abetted. Such was held to be the case of one who had abetted the offence of bigamy on the part of a woman whose husband was alive.<sup>2</sup>

1068. The words “if that offence be not committed” are inapt and may lead to difficulty in construction. Suppose, for instance, that a man abets theft on the road<sup>3</sup> and the person abetted commits theft in a building.<sup>4</sup> Is the abettor liable to the penal consequences of this section or of section 109? It has been held that in such a case the two offences are distinct, and that the abettor is not liable under section 109 (§§ 1016-1017). But an offence committed does not become a different offence from the offence abetted merely because it is punishable under a different section. As observed before, if the two are substantially one, then the abettor is liable for the offence committed, and he cannot say that because the offence he had abetted fell under one section, and the offence committed falls under another section that therefore the two offences are different for the purpose of his punishment. The question has been already discussed at some length and reference must be made to it for the purpose of ascertaining whether the offence committed was committed in consequence of the abetment, and whether the offence committed is the same as the offence abetted within the meaning of this section (§§ 1010, 1016, 1017).

1069. Turning now to the second clause, it will be observed that the public servants there spoken of are not all public servants, as that term is defined in the Code. The object of the clause is to provide for enhanced punishment only if the person abetting or abetted is “a public servant whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence," that is to say, if the abetment is of a public servant whose duty as such public servant is to prevent the commission of the very offence abetted. Where therefore, the prisoner was "feeling his way" if the civil surgeon will accept a bribe, and the latter stopped him from making further advances, it was held that the offence of abetment was complete but it was an offence punishable under the first clause and not under the second clause of this section. And this because though the civil surgeon was undoubtedly a public servant, still he was not a public servant whose duty it was as a public servant to prevent the offering of bribes. It is not his duty to prevent the commission of such offence of bribing any further than it is the duty of every good citizen to do what he can to keep people about him honest, and to prevent the commission of any offence whatever. Cases might be readily supposed to which this latter half of the section would directly apply; for instance, it is the duty of a customs-house officer to prevent fraud upon the revenue in the way of smuggling, and consequently, abetting him in the commission of such a fraud would be abetting the commission of an offence by a public servant, whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence?<sup>1</sup> In the case of the attempt to bribe the civil surgeon the proper measure of punishment was that laid down in the first paragraph. The same rule would apply to an offer of a bribe made to a police-officer, for bribery is not a cognizable offence or one which it is the duty of a police-officer to prevent. Illustrations (a) and (b) consequently fall under the first clause, while illustrations (c) and (d) are instances of the operation of the second clause. As this section applies also to special or local laws,<sup>2</sup> it has a wider application than the Code of which it is a part. Consequently, a pleader who sent a printed circular to the other pleaders inviting them to send him cases offering to share with them his fee in the case, was held to be guilty of abetment of an offence under section 36 of the Legal Practitioners Act, and therefore, punishable under this section.<sup>3</sup>

1070. Analogous Law.—This section stood as clause 93 in the draft Bill which contained the following additional illustration<sup>4</sup>:—

"(b) A inserts in a newspaper an article advising soldiers to shoot every commanding officer who uses them harshly. A has committed the offence defined in this clause."

1070-A. Two objections were taken to this clause (i) that it was too vague and would lead to malicious prosecutions, unless the instigation be confined to some overt acts like the illustrations; and (ii) that the number "ten" was arbitrarily fixed. It was said that the substitution of the words "or any class of persons" should be an improvement. The force of the first objection was conceded, and the commissioners recommended that "it may be most expedient to define the manner of instigation by the terms used in clause 113 (now s. 124-A) relating to attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government of such terms as may be settled when that clause comes under consideration."<sup>5</sup> This suggestion was not, however, acceded to.

1071. Procedure.—The procedure applicable to an offence under this section is the same as in the case of the offence abetted. The offence can be tried as a summons case.<sup>1</sup>

1072. Proof.—The points requiring proof are—

- (1) the accused had abetted ;
- (2) the commission of an act ;
- (3) which was an offence under the Code, or any special or local law ;<sup>2</sup>
- (4) and that the persons abetted were at least 11 persons, or the public generally.<sup>3</sup>

1073. Charge.—In framing the charge the following form may be adopted :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate or Judge) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That you, —on or about the —day —at —, abetted the commission of the offence of —by —numbering more than ten persons (or the public generally) by (state the act done by accused in instigation), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 117 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge (add by the said Court in case of committal). ”

1074. Principle.—The definition of abetment does not require that the persons abetted should be defined and not be a fluctuating body of men. This section proceeds on the same assumption. Consequently, one may be punished for abetment though the prosecution may be unable to point to the men abetted. Such persons may be “ the public ” a term which means as it has been defined to include, “ any class of the public or any community.”<sup>4</sup> (§ 105). It is not necessary under this section that the offence abetted should be committed. Indeed, when it is so, the abettor will be visited by the severer penalty provided in other sections.

1075. It will be observed that the abetment under this section involves the commission of an offence “ by any number or class of persons exceeding ten ” who must commit the offence collectively and not individually. Where, for instance, the prisoners abetted 12 coolies in breaking their separate contracts it was held that inasmuch as each breach of contract was a separate offence under s. 492 by each coolie, the abetment of such breach could not be punished under this section, notwithstanding that more than 10 coolies broke their contracts in consequence of such abetment.<sup>5</sup> The posting of a leaflet, inciting the public to commit an offence would not be punished under this section, if it was removed before anybody could have read it. Such posting falls short of abetment defined under s. 107.<sup>6</sup>

1076. Analogous Law.—The concealment of a design to commit an offence constitutes an abetment, within the meaning of s. 107, and such abetment is an offence when the person making the concealment was under legal obligation to disclose it (§ 980).

1077. For persons who are under such obligation, see § 981, and s. 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.<sup>1</sup>

1078. This and the next two following sections deal with concealment previous to the commission of an offence. Subsequent concealment is penalized by ss. 202 and 203. The former are directed to the prevention of crime, the latter to punishing them.

1079. Procedure.—An offence under this section is non-bailable, if the offence concealed is committed, otherwise the offence is bailable. In other respects the procedure is the same as in the case of the offence abetted.

1080. Proof.—An offence under this section requires proof of the following particulars:—

- (1) the existence of the design to commit an offence,
  - (2) which offence was one punishable with death or transportation for life,
  - (3) that accused concealed the existence of such design—
    - (a) by his act, or
    - (b) by an illegal omission, or
    - (c) by his knowingly making false representation,
  - (4) that the concealment was made voluntarily, and
  - (5) intending thereby to facilitate or knowing that he would thereby facilitate the commission of such offence,
- to which may be added the aggravating circumstance,
- (6) that the offence concealed was committed.

1081. Charge.—The following is an appropriate form of a charge under this section:—

“That you,—on or about the—day of—at—, with the intention of facilitating or with the knowledge that you will thereby facilitate the commission of the offence of—(specify the act) (or omit to do—specify the omission) to conceal the existence of the design to commit the said offence, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 118 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

“And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge (or in the case of committal by the said Court).”

1082. Principle.—This and the next two following sections deal with the law of criminal concealment—the essence of the crime consisting in the facility thereby given to offenders for the perpetration of crime. This section recognized concealment as of two kinds: (a) concealment by misrepresentation, and (b) concealment by non-disclosure. The former affects the public generally, the latter only affects those upon whom it lies to make the disclosure. All the three sections only apply to offences punishable with imprisonment. They exclude those which are punishable with fine only. And as the sections make it clear, the concealment to be criminal, must be intentional or, at least, with knowledge that it will thereby facilitate the commission of crime.

1083. Meaning of Words.—“Thereby facilitate the commission of an offence”: The offering of facility may in itself constitute abetment. When it is so, the offender may be liable as an abettor. “Conceals” means conceals from the public servants entrusted with the duty of preventing offences. A Sub-Inspector of Police aware of an impending dacoity may conceal the fact as much from his subordinates as he may conceal it from his superior officers who direct and control him in his executive duties. "The existence of a design" which does not necessarily mean a plot. But it must be something more than a mere mental determination to commit a crime. But the expression of that determination converts it into a design "Any representation.....respecting such design": A representation is a categorical statement of fact. It is not a mere expression of opinion. But the form is immaterial, if it was a representation, though it was expressed in the form of an opinion. "If that offence be committed," the test of identity being its essential character rather than the sections of the Code.

1084. Criminal Concealment when Penal.—This and the next two following sections deal with the law of criminal concealment as a branch of the law of abetment. As the liability in such cases may as much depend upon false representation as on illegal omission, the highly penal rules here laid down require strict construction. The subject of concealment as treated in the section may consist of (a) false representation (b) an act, or (c) an illegal omission.

1085. Criminally False Representation.—So far as the question of false representation is concerned, the section affects the public generally. For no one has a right to demand another to speak, but if he speaks he has no right to speak falsely. But however much may a false statement be reprobated by morality, law has no power to punish it as such. It visits a false speaker with its penalty, if his falsehood has deceived some one, or, if at any rate, it was intended to cause deception on a subject affecting public peace. And even then it makes allowance for thoughtless lies spoken on insufficient data and with no ulterior object in view. The statements which law regards criminal must be (a) known to be false; (b) they must be made respecting a design and the hall-mark of criminality is stamped on them (c) they are made with intent to facilitate or knowing it likely that he would thereby facilitate the commission of an offence punishable with death, transportation or imprisonment. Consequently, it is not every false statement that is criminal. To be criminal it must answer the requirements of the above tests. Now, in the first place, what is a representation? As before remarked (§ 1083), it is not a mere expression of opinion or the statement of a probable contingency, or the suggestion of a possible hypothesis. It must be a categorical assertion, at least an assertion having that effect, whatever may have been its form. Suppose, for instance, in the illustration appended to the section, A were to say to the Magistrate "I hear that the dacoity rumoured to be committed at B will be committed at C"—the statement may be perfectly innocuous in itself, for A may be merely giving expression to hearsay, or he may be adroitly suggesting to the Magistrate the relaxation of his vigilance at B so that the dacoity may the more easily be committed. In the former case the statement would not amount to a representation at all, though in the latter case it will be a representation within the meaning of this section.

1086. The fact that a representation is made is not enough; it must be false to the knowledge of the maker. This will exclude the repetition of an idle rumour, of what is no more than an intelligent anticipation of a likely event. Lastly, the false representation must be made with intent to facilitate, or knowing it likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence. It is this element that tinctures the concealment with criminality, as it facilitates the perpetration of crime by making its prevention difficult. As, however, the object of law is to prevent the commission of serious crime, the last requisite confines the operation of the rule to offences punishable with imprisonment.

1087. Concealment by an Act or Illegal Omission.—Turning next to concealment by any act, cases are conceivable when the authorities may be easily deluded by a feint. In such a case there may be no word spoken, but, nevertheless, the purpose intended and the effect likely to be produced is the same. If, for instance, in the illustration given, suppose that A instead of misinforming the Magistrate about the scene of dacoity were to drop tools and things of the dacoits in the direction of C thereby making the Magistrate believe that the dacoits had taken that course, would the result be any different? As regards wilful misrepresentations and acts the rule is the same, and it is applicable alike to all, whether public servants or otherwise. But as regards illegal omissions the rule is different, for the public are under no obligation to furnish the authorities with information concerning offences other than those specified in s. 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.<sup>1</sup> In such offences it is the duty which the public share equally with the police, Magistrates and others to inform the authorities about "the commission of, or of the intention of any other person to commit" them.<sup>2</sup> Village headmen, accountants, landholders and every officer employed in the collection of revenue or rent of land on the part of Government or the Court of Wards are similarly enjoined with the duty of communicating to the nearest Magistrate, or to the officer in charge of the nearest police station any information, which he may obtain respecting the commission of or intention to commit in or near their village any non-bailable offence, or any offence punishable under ss. 143, 145, 147 or 148 of the Code, and of certain other offences committed or intended to be committed at any place out of British India near such village.<sup>3</sup> In such cases, then, there is on the part of the persons so named a further statutory obligation to assist the authorities in the manner and to the extent therein required. Persons who omit to comply with such statutory requirements are then guilty of illegal omission for which they may be liable under this section, if it is prompted by the intention or knowledge of facilitating the commission of those offences, and if the omission was made "voluntarily."<sup>4</sup> (§§ 310-313).

1088. As regards the police and Magistrates within their jurisdiction their duties are more extensive, and as they are specially retained for the preservation of peace and suppression of disorder, their responsibilities are commensurately far greater. But in both cases the test is the same, namely, whether the concealment was wilful and whether it was made with the intent or knowledge of thereby facilitating the commission of the offence. The fact that the omission was likely to facilitate the commission of the offence is material and must be clearly established.<sup>5</sup> Added to it must be established knowledge of the design and knowledge of the value of its suppression.

Here A has, by an illegal omission concealed the existence of B's design, and is liable to punishment according to the provision of this section.

[Public servant—s. 21.][Offence—s. 40.]

1089. Analogous Law.—This section is a class section and applies only to public servants whose duty it is as such public servants to prevent the suppression of offences. Otherwise the section is the same as section 118.

1090. Procedure.—An offence under this section is non-bailable if the offence concealed is committed, or if it is punishable with death or transportation for life otherwise it is bailable.<sup>1</sup> It is cognizable and compoundable if the offence abetted is so, and it is triable by the Court by which the offence abetted is triable.

1091. Proof.—The facts necessary to establish an offence under this section are the following :—

- (1) The existence of the design to commit an offence ;
- (2) That the accused was a public servant ;
- (3) That it was his duty to prevent the commission of that offence ;
- (4) That he concealed the existence of such design—
  - (a) by his act, or
  - (b) by his illegal omission, or
  - (c) by his knowingly false representation ;
- (5) That the concealment was made voluntarily ;
- (6) That the accused thereby intended to facilitate, or knew that he would thereby facilitate the commission of such offence, to which may be proved by way of aggravation, if the facts warrant it ; and
- (7) That the offence concealed was committed.

1092. Charge.—The charge under this section should be framed on the same lines as a charge under section 118, the following clause being added :—

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—being a public servant whose duty it was to prevent the commission of the offence of—with the intention of facilitating, etc.”

1093. Principle.—This section is the adaptation of s. 118 to public servants. It prescribes an enhanced penalty applicable to the case of public servants, whose duty it is, as such public servants, to prevent the commission of the offence the design to commit which they conceal.

1094. The liability of the public servants is under this section circumscribed by their duty. They only incur the graver consequences of this section if they conceal a design to commit an offence which it is their duty to prevent. The meaning of this phrase has already been set out under the last section. (§ 1087).

120. Whoever, intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence punishable with imprisonment, voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design to commit such offence, or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design, shall, if the offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth, and, if the offence be not committed, to one-eighth of the longest term of such imprisonment, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

1095. Analogous Law.—This section is complementary to s. 118 which applies only to offences punishable with death or transportation for life. This section extends the same rule to offences punishable with imprisonment. All offences, save only those punishable with a fine, are thus included in the two sections. The offences so excluded are too trivial to require prevention by such drastic rules.

1096. Procedure and Proof.—The procedure relating to an offence under this section is exactly the same as in the case of the offence abetted. The evidence must establish the same points as in a case under s. 118 except that, instead of proving that the offence concealed was punishable with death or transportation, it must be proved that it was punishable with imprisonment (§ 1079).

1097. Charge.—The charge should similarly follow the wording of the form set out under s. 118 (§ 1081).

CHAPTER V-A.

CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY.

Definition of criminal conspiracy.

120-A. When two or more persons agree to do, or cause to be done—

(1) an illegal act, or

(2) an act, which is not illegal, by illegal means, such an agreement is designated a criminal conspiracy :

Provided that no agreement except an agreement to commit an offence shall amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more parties to such agreement in pursuance thereof.

Explanation.—It is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of such agreement, or is merely incidental to that object.

1098. Analogous Law.—This Chapter comprising sections 120-A and 120-B was enacted by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act 1913.<sup>1</sup> Its scope is explained by the following Statement of Objects and Reasons:<sup>2</sup>

“The sections of the Indian Penal Code which deal directly with the subject of conspiracy are those contained in Chapter V and section 121-A of that Code. Under the latter provision, it is an offence to conspire to commit any of the offences punishable by section 121 of the Indian Penal Code or to conspire to deprive the King of the sovereignty of British India or of any part thereof, or to overawe, by means of criminal force or show of criminal force, the Government of India or any Local Government, and to constitute a conspiracy under this section it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission should take place in pursuance thereof. Under section 107 abetment includes the engaging with one or more person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of a thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and in order to the doing of that thing. In other words, except in respect of the offences particularized in section 121-A conspiracy per se is not an offence under the Indian Penal Code,

“On the other hand by the Common Law of England if two or more persons agree together to do anything contrary to Law, or to use unlawful means in the carrying out of an object not otherwise unlawful, the persons, who so agree, commit the offence of conspiracy. In other words, conspiracy in England may be defined as an agreement of two or more persons to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means, and the parties to such a conspiracy are liable to indictment.

“Experience has shown that dangerous conspiracies are entered into in India which have for their object aims other than the commission of the offences specified in section 121-A of the Indian Penal Code and that the existing law is inadequate to deal with modern conditions. The present Bill is designed to assimilate the provisions of the Indian Penal Code to those of the English Law with the additional safeguard that in the case of a conspiracy other than a conspiracy to commit an offence some overt act is necessary to bring the conspiracy within the purview of the criminal law. The Bill makes criminal conspiracy a substantive offence, and when such a conspiracy is to commit an offence punishable with death, transportation or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards, and no express provision is made in the Code, provides a punishment of the same nature as that which might be awarded for the abetment of such an offence. In all other cases of criminal conspiracy the punishment contemplated is imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding six months, or with fine, or with both.”

1099. This definition in this section is taken from that formulated by Lord Brampton,<sup>3</sup> who defined a conspiracy thus ; “If two or more persons agree together to do something contrary to law, or wrongful and harmful towards another person, or to use unlawful means in the carrying out of an object not otherwise unlawful, the persons who so agree commit the crime of conspiracy.” The gist of the offence here separated and enlarged is implied in the offence of abetment as defined in section 107, “secondly;” but this Chapter is justified on the ground that cases occur which could not be punished as those of abetment which naturally implies a closer connection between the criminal and the crime.

1100. As the avowed object of the Legislature in enacting this Chapter was to assimilate the Indian to English Criminal Law with an additional safeguard that the conspiracy must be followed up by an overt act, it will be instructive to see in what light the English Common Law views the offence of criminal conspiracy.

1101. Conspiracy is an offence peculiar to the English Law and its present form has been gradual and marks three distinct stages in its evolution. In its first stage (1290 A.D.-1611 A.D.) the offence, though formulated at common law appears to have been confined to a conspiracy to obstruct or pervert or defeat or delay justice, or to exort under colour of office, and even as such it remained without any adequate sentence. The offence, however, assumed a more concrete form in 1611 A.D., when in a decided case<sup>1</sup> it was for the first time settled that the agreement for a conspiracy was indictable as a substantive offence even when nothing had been done to execute it. The third and final stage in its development was reached some years later in 1665 A.D., when the Judges declared that "all confederacies whatsoever wrongfully to prejudice a third person are highly criminal."<sup>2</sup>

1102. This has since been held to include all combinations which involve violation of the private rights of individuals, which, if done by a single person, would give a civil though not a criminal remedy against the delinquent. Sir Robert Wright thinks that the inception of this development lies on the misunderstanding of a leading case by Hawkins<sup>3</sup> which led to a crop of cases without adequate examination of the data upon which it was founded. He analyses the decisions to show that, as a general rule, a combination to injure a private person is not criminal unless the means to be employed are criminal, that is, in other words, conspiracy as such is not punishable save when it is a conspiracy to commit a crime. Modern legal opinion endorses this view, but against it there is the accumulated weight of decided cases,<sup>4</sup> though they are by no means unanimous, some still confining the operation of the rule to a conspiracy to commit an offence.<sup>5</sup> The English parentage ascribed to this chapter, so far as it relates to a conspiracy to do an illegal act or by illegal means, is consequently of doubtful legality and policy.

1103. Criminal conspiracy has been the subject of legislation from very early period in England. As already stated, in 1305 A.D., an Ordinance<sup>6</sup> was passed to punish persons conspiring to corrupt the course of justice. Several statutes now exist prescribing penalties for criminal conspiracies to commit various offences, such as murder,<sup>7</sup> to cause explosion,<sup>8</sup> or those relating to unions,<sup>9</sup> or those fomenting trade disputes.<sup>10</sup> It is of the essence of a conspiracy that two or more persons should agree to do an unlawful act, which agreement is then stated to be an overt act sufficient to complete the offence.<sup>11</sup> The proviso to this section is intended to overrule this view so far as it relates to a conspiracy other than a conspiracy to commit an offence, and limit that offence to an overt act done in furtherance but independently of the conspiracy (§ 1113).

has so far as it relates to acts done in furtherance or contemplation of a trade dispute, been altered by the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, ss. 1, 3, 4 and 5 (3) (6 Ed. VII, c. 47).

1104. But while in this respect the Indian definition is narrower than its English prototype, in another respect the offence here is much wider inasmuch while here a criminal conspiracy as such is punishable, the English common law in England stands discredited<sup>1</sup> and has been greatly modified by Statute, for which the Indian Statute law furnishes no corresponding analogy. Moreover, under English Law, since the husband and wife are treated as one person, they form an exception, but this exception too is not acceded to in this Chapter. The result of this sweeping enactment is to make a mere breach of contract by two or more persons punishable as a crime. If, for instance, the husband and his wife agree to sell their house and then think better of it and refuse to convey they would be liable to be imprisoned under the next section though the Civil Court may not have enforced specific performance of their contract. Other instances could be multiplied to illustrate the absurdity of this legislation.

1105. The Statement of Objects and Reasons appears in this respect to be inaccurate, since it goes beyond merely assimilating the criminal law of India to that in force in England. The distinction is important inasmuch as an act may be illegal without being criminal,<sup>2</sup> and cases in England have clearly pointed out that a man may do acts prejudicial to the civil rights of others without being indicted for conspiracy. So an indictment will not lie for a conspiracy to commit a mere civil trespass<sup>3</sup> or a conspiracy to deprive a man of an office under an illegal trading company.

1106. Certain conspiracies are otherwise punishable as distinct offences under the Code. Taking them into account, the Code now deals with the following conspiracies :—

- (1) Conspiracy to wage war (S. 121-A).
- (2) Thugi (s. 311).
- (3) Belonging to a gang of thieves (s. 401).
- (4) Being a member of an assembly of dacoits (s. 402).
- (5) Abetment by conspiracy (s. 107, "Secondly").
- (6) Conspiracy to commit an offence.
- (7) Conspiracy to do an illegal act.

1107. Principle.—The constituent elements of the offence of criminal conspiracy are (1) an agreement between one or more persons, (2) to do an illegal act, (3) to do a legal act by illegal means, (4) an overt act done in pursuance of the conspiracy. The first three ingredients suffice for the definition of a criminal conspiracy under English Common Law, but in the case of a conspiracy other than a conspiracy to commit an offence, this section further requires the doing of an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy. In other words, while an overt act is necessary under both laws, English Law considers the mutual consultation and agreement as a sufficient overt act,<sup>4</sup> whereas the Code in one instance goes a step further and requires some act independent of it. But the offence here is in other respects much wider.

1108. Meaning of Words.—"An illegal act" within the meaning of s. 43. "Some act.....is done.....in pursuance thereof": The word "act" here also includes an illegal omission. Two soldiers A and B conspire to blow up a powder magazine. A is on sentry duty when B passes him; A does not challenge him. Both A and B are guilty of criminal conspiracy inasmuch A's failure to challenge B was an illegal omission being an act done in pursuance of the conspiracy between A and B. But if in this case A had gone to sleep when B passed, A was unquestionably guilty of an illegal omission, but not being in pursuance of the conspiracy it is not such an act as is necessary to constitute the crime. "Is merely incidental to that object": The explanation refers only to clause 1, and is intended to show that the illegal act need not be material to the object of the conspiracy.

1109. Essentials of Criminal Conspiracy.—The four essential ingredients of a criminal conspiracy have been already set out (§ 1107). Shortly stated, the offence involves (i) an agreement to do, (ii) an illegal act, or (iii) by illegal means, (iv) the agreement being followed by an overt act.

1110. It will be observed that there can be no conspiracy without an agreement which is an advancement of the intention which each has conceived in his mind, which then passes from a secret intention to the stage of mutual consultation and concert, proof of which may be available in the evidence of an accomplice which must, however, be definitive as to the agreement “to do or cause to be done” the act charged; which, again, must be shown to be illegal within the meaning ascribed to that term in section 43 which generally follows the English Law.<sup>1</sup> It is, of course immaterial that the offence agreed on is one which one of the conspirators could not singly commit. So in an English case where a woman who erroneously believed herself with child conspired with another to procure abortion, she was held liable to be convicted of conspiracy to procure abortion although if she had merely done the act to herself with like intent she could not have been convicted.<sup>2</sup> It will be observed that many acts of conspiracy to be found in the law books would be punishable here as amounting to abetment, as for example, conspiring to obtain money<sup>3</sup> or goods by false pretence,<sup>4</sup> conspiring to defraud the public by mock-action<sup>5</sup> or by forcing up the price of shares by circulating false rumours,<sup>6</sup> and the like.

1111. To amount to the offence of criminal conspiracy an agreement must be to do that which is contrary to or forbidden by law. Being a highly technical offence, this ingredient of the crime is essential and must be strictly proved.<sup>7</sup> An agreement which is immoral or against public policy, or in restraint of trade or otherwise of such a character that the Courts will not enforce it is not necessarily illegal.<sup>8</sup> But since an act may be illegal without being criminal it follows that an agreement to do an illegal act may amount to criminal conspiracy though it may not be punishable as such.<sup>9</sup> It may be an offence to conspire with another to do an act which, if done alone, would not be criminal e.g., procuring a woman to become a prostitute,<sup>10</sup> or to have illicit connection with a man.<sup>11</sup>

1112. The end does not justify the means in criminal law. If, therefore, one conspires with another to employ illegal means to achieve a legal purpose, one may be convicted of conspiracy. It is not difficult to conceive of such cases. For instance, it is not illegal to undersell a rival trader, but it would be illegal for the latter to combine to ruin the seller of cheap goods by inducing to give credit to a bankrupt purchaser and thereby cause him loss.<sup>12</sup>

to have conspired to import firearms and ammunition in contravention of the Arms Act they were held guilty of this offence.<sup>1</sup>

1114. The explanation follows the general principle that an illegal act cannot be justified by reason of mistake, accident or the like. But the illegal act must have some bearing on the object of the agreement, otherwise the two cannot be connected. For instance, suppose A and B agree to murder C. One of them A goes to purchase a revolver in a false name. Both are guilty because A's illegal act, though not the murder of C in which B had conspired, is yet incidental to that object.

120-B. (1) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with death, transportation or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards shall, where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy, be punished in the same manner as if he had abetted such offence.

Punishment of criminal conspiracy.

(2) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy other than a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable as aforesaid shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding six months, or with fine, or with both.

1115. Analogous Law.—This section is of course not retrospective,<sup>2</sup> but an offence made punishable under it may be otherwise dealt with as an abetment though conspiracy is a substantive offence, and is distinct from abetment.<sup>3</sup> This section prescribes punishment for really two offences of varying gravity, viz., (i) criminal conspiracy as such, and (ii) criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with at least two years. The section is, moreover, supplementary, as criminal conspiracies though not expressly provided by the Code, were before the enactment of this section treated as abetment, which again, when of the more serious character is the subject of express and separate penalties.<sup>4</sup>

1116. Procedure and Practice.—Section 196-A of the Criminal Procedure Code provides for previous sanction of the Local Government to the institution of a prosecution for this offence where its object is to commit any non-cognizable offence, or a cognizable offence not punishable with death.<sup>5</sup> As regards procedure the offence under clause 1 follows that applicable to the offence which is the object of the conspiracy—that is to say, it is cognizable—warrant or summons—bailable or non-bailable as the offence which is the object of the conspiracy. It is not compoundable and triable by the Court of Session if the offence which is the object of the conspiracy is triable exclusively by such Court; in the case of all other offences it is triable by the Court of Sessions—Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class. If the offence falls under clause 2, a warrant or a summons may issue in the first instance. It is bailable and not compoundable and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class.

1117. Charge.—No person can be convicted of this offence without a proper complaint and a charge.<sup>6</sup> In a conspiracy case the accused can be charged with conspiracy with persons unknown, but if they are charged with conspiring with persons known then such persons must be named in the charge, otherwise the charge would fail.<sup>7</sup> An indictment for conspiracy must contain a statement of the facts relied upon as constituting the offence in ordinary and concise language, with as much certainty as the nature of the case will admit.<sup>8</sup> Strictly speaking, in cases where an offence has been committed in pursuance of a conspiracy, there should not be any conviction for conspiracy, but for abetment of the offence, for conspiracy followed by an act done to carry out the purpose of conspiracy amounts to abetment.<sup>1</sup>

1118. The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That you, on or about the — day of — at — agreed with (name of the co-conspirator), to do (or cause to be done) an illegal act, to wit—(or an act to wit—which is not illegal by illegal means to wit—) and that you did some acts, to wit — besides the agreement in pursuance of the said agreement to commit the offence of—punishable with death (or transportation, etc.) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 120-B of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or High Court).

1119. Proof.—This is a highly technical offence and all its ingredients must be strictly proved.<sup>2</sup> Where two persons were tried for an offence under section 120B read with s. 302, I. P.C., and one of them was acquitted, the other could not be convicted of the offence under this section.<sup>3</sup> Where an accused was fined under ss. 302-120-B read with sections 302 and 364 and the verdict of the jury was silent about the charge under section 302, but found him guilty under ss. 120B and 364 it was held that since the verdict of the jury did not negative, the charge under section 302 a retrial under that section was ordered.<sup>4</sup> The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused agreed with another.
- (2) To do an act, or caused it to be done.
- (3) That such act was illegal or was done by illegal means.
- (4) Proof of an overt act if the agreement was not an agreement to commit an offence.

1119-A. It is of the very essence of conspiracy that the conspirators should plot and act in secret. Direct evidence of agreement is not, therefore, always available. It has then to be established by the evidence of acts and conduct which connect the crime with common design in which the conspirators have probably been all assigned a part.<sup>5</sup> As Buller, J., said in a case : “ In indictments of this kind, there are two things to be considered : first, whether any conspiracy exists ; and next, what share the prisoner took in the conspiracy.....Before the evidence of the conspiracy can affect the prisoner materially, it is necessary to make out another point, viz., that he consented to the extent that the others did.”<sup>6</sup>

1119-B. The fact that two persons were co-operating for the attainment of the same end is some indication, though not necessarily the evidence of conspiracy. Bull in England and Schmidt on the Continent were engaged in forging a plate. While Schmidt was on the Continent, Bull ordered an innocent agent to manufacture the plate. Both Bull and Schmidt took delivery of it. On their trial, it was contended for Schmidt that he was only an accessory before the fact, and that so far as he was concerned it was as good as if Bull had himself manufactured the plate, whereupon Reid, C.J., said : “ That reasoning would be good if the actual maker had been a guilty party, because he would stand in a different position to those who had counselled him to the commission of the crime. But it altogether fails where the immediate agent is an innocent one. Then, those who have plotted and arranged that he should do the particular act are themselves principals. Suppose the prisoners had been both abroad, and that, having planned the forgery, one of them had given the order for the plate by letter, can it be doubted that they would be indicted as principals ; and can it make any difference that one of them is in this country ?

It seems to me, then, that the circumstance of the immediate agent in this forgery being an innocent person renders the rule of law as to principal and accessory inapplicable."<sup>1</sup> To which Alderson, B., added: If a person does an act of this kind, with a guilty intent, he is not the agent of any one. If he does it innocently, he is the agent of some person or persons; and if two have agreed to employ him, he is the agent of both. In this case, therefore, it is a question for the jury whether the prisoners were jointly acting in procuring this plate to be made. If they were, then the engraver acts on behalf of both. It makes no difference whether they were in England or elsewhere; when they have once agreed to do the thing, the act of one is the act of all, although the rest be absent at the time."<sup>2</sup> So where some of the confederates inveigle themselves into the confidence of an innocent person and lure him to take the bait, all are guilty of the crime as principals.<sup>3</sup> They will, however, be principals or abettors here according to the part they have taken in the plot.

1120. Principle.—The encouragement and support which co-conspirators give to one another rendering enterprises possible which, if left to individual effort, would have been impossible, furnish the ground for visiting conspirators and abettors with condign punishment.

1121. Meaning of Words.—"Where no express provision is made in this Code for punishment of such a conspiracy": Express provisions are made in sections 121-A, 311, 401 and 402.<sup>4</sup> The provision need not specify the offence as one of conspiracy.

1122. Evidence of Conspiracy.—Direct evidence is seldom available to prove a conspiracy. Even when available, it is tainted, being that of an accomplice and requires corroboration. Consequently, conspiracy is generally a matter of inference deduced from certain criminal acts of the parties accused, done in pursuance of an apparent criminal purpose in common between them.<sup>5</sup> It is from this point of view that overt acts may properly be looked to as evidence of the existence of a concerted intention. The criminality of the conspiracy is independent of the criminality of the overt acts,<sup>6</sup> but a man's guilt must be established by proof of facts and not merely proof of his character.<sup>7</sup> The prosecution may go into evidence on the nature of the conspiracy before it gives evidence to connect the accused with it.<sup>8</sup> The acts and declarations of any of the conspirators in furtherance of the common design may be given in evidence against all,<sup>9</sup> but they must directly tend to the proof or disproof of the matter in issue: "It is undoubtedly not competent for the prosecution to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused is a person likely from his conduct or character to have committed the offence for which he is being tried."

1123. Such evidence may comprise printed handbills or placards or speeches of co-conspirators and resolutions at their meetings.<sup>10</sup> But before all such evidence is admissible there must be proof of a conspiracy and that the accused were members of the same conspiracy and that the act in question was done in furtherance of the common design. But if A and B are charged with a conspiracy to cheat P, evidence is admissible to prove that they had similarly cheated R and S.<sup>1</sup> The rule in this respect is formulated in the Indian Evidence Act.<sup>2</sup> Conspiracy may be proved by the evidence of the conduct of the accused and the surrounding circumstances both before and after the commission of the offence without proving any overt act of the accused.<sup>3</sup> But the conduct and the surrounding circumstances must bear upon the offence and must not be too remote. For instance, the facts that the accused was an associate of the conspirators and was anxious to escape observation and was doing his best to conceal his whereabouts after the date of the occurrence connected with the criminal conspiracies, or was assisting the conspirators in their defence; though all relevant fall short of the proof of an agreement which is the gist of the crime.<sup>4</sup>

1124. As the crime of conspiracy involves the agreement of at least two persons, if two persons are tried together for conspiring with one another, and there is no charge of conspiring with any one else, they must be both acquitted or both convicted.<sup>5</sup> It is not, however, necessary that the two conspirators should be jointly tried or both tried, for one of them might be pardoned or tried afterwards but if one of the two is tried and acquitted, the conviction of the other cannot stand.<sup>6</sup> But otherwise one of two conspirators may be convicted of conspiracy in the absence of the other, if the Court is satisfied that the other conspirator was also guilty, and would have been convicted if he had been before the Court.<sup>7</sup>

1125. Where two conspirators are jointly tried, the confession of one is relevant against the other.<sup>8</sup> It is, of course, not necessary that all conspirators should join the conspiracy at the same time. Some may form it, while others may join it afterwards. In that case they will be all equally guilty.<sup>9</sup>

1126. It will be noticed that proof of an independent overt act is not required where the conspiracy is to commit an offence, such evidence being only necessary in cases punishable under clause 2. (§ 1107).

CHAPTER VI.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE STATE.

1127. Topical Introduction.—This chapter comprises ten sections, the first three of which deal with preparation,<sup>1</sup> conspiracy,<sup>2</sup> and the actual waging of war against the King.<sup>3</sup> Section 123 deals with abetment by criminal concealment, and in this respect it is an aggravated form of the offence punishable under sections 118 and 120. Sections 125-127 refer to hostile acts directed against any Asiatic power in alliance with the King. The two groups of sections are thus directed to the securing of external and internal peace. Section 124-A is directed against sedition which may be regarded as a precautionary section intended to avert internal commotion and civil war. Sections 121-123 and 124-A are thus directed to the preservation of the State. Sections 125-127 to the preservation of allied foreign States, and the remaining sections have the same object in view, though they are not directly conducive to its preservation. There are thus four principal offences dealt with in this chapter: (i) Waging war against the King (ss. 121, 121A, 122, 123), (ii) waging war against an Asiatic ally (ss. 125, 126, 127), (iii) overawing the Government (ss. 124, 124A), and (iv) permitting or aiding the escape of a State prisoner or a prisoner of war (ss. 128, 129, 130).

1128. Analogous Law.—This chapter was the subject of much comment at the hands of the Law Commissioners. The natives of India were not subject to the English Law of High Treason.<sup>5</sup> There was no corresponding law in the Regulations of the Company. The Council of India had no power to enact such law and it was a necessary part of the Code. The Commissioners, then, recommended that a draft of the new law should be adopted and referred to the Home Authorities, and this was done.<sup>6</sup> The action taken by them was to consult their law advisers who declared in favour of the power to pass these sections by the Council of India. An Act of Parliament to explain and define the powers of that Council was also passed, and any doubt that might have existed as to the competency of the Indian Legislature to enact these rules was set at rest by an Act of the body in whom are centred all the legislative powers of the British Constitution.<sup>7</sup>

1129. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and exclusively triable by the Court of Sessions. It is an offence in which the Magistrate may issue warrant in the first instance. No prosecution under this section can be initiated except "upon complaint made by order of, or under authority from, the Governor-General in Council, the Local Government, or some officer empowered by the Governor-General in Council in this behalf."<sup>8</sup> Such order or authority must be strictly proved in the manner laid down by s. 78 of the Indian Evidence Act, and the identity of the prisoner with the person named in the order or authority of the Government must be established.<sup>1</sup> A similar sanction is also required for a prosecution under the English Statute, but in England a prosecution must commence within six months of the grant of sanction. There is, however, no period fixed within which sanction for a prosecution may be applied for.

1130. Proof.—The evidence required to establish a case under this section must be directed to the proving of the following points :—

- (1) That the accused “waged war” or attempted to do so or abetted the same.
- (2) That such war was against the King.

1131. Charge.—The following form may be adopted in framing charge under this section :—

“I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows :—

“That you——on or about the——day of——at——waged war (or attempted to wage war, or abetted the waging of war) against His Majesty the Emperor of India and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 121 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or if the charge is framed by a Presidency Magistrate, High Court).

“And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge.”<sup>2</sup>

1132. Principle.—All states have the same right of self-preservation as their subjects, and States like men have, from time immemorial, enacted safeguards for their own preservation and protection. In monarchical forms of Governments, the right was exalted into a sacred right, indeed as sacred as the person of Gods and so the violation of one as the other was considered a lese majestie—lese majestie human, being an offence against the power, crown, dignity, and majesty of that but too visible God, whose throne was upon earth; lese majestie divine, being an offence against the power, crown, dignity and majesty of the invisible God, whose throne is in heaven.<sup>3</sup> Lese majestie of the civil law now corresponds to High Treason of the English law, which comprises of the following :—

- (i) When a man doth compass or imagine the death of the King, his Queen or of his eldest son and heir;
- (ii) When a man violates the King’s companion, his eldest daughter unmarried, or the wife of the eldest son and heir;
- (iii) If a man levy war against the King in his realm;
- (iv) If a man be adherent to the King’s enemies in his realm, giving to them aid and comfort in the realm or elsewhere;
- (v) If a man counterfeit the King’s Great or Privy Seal;
- (vi) If a man make or pass counterfeit coin;
- (vii) If a man slay the Chancellor, the Treasurer or the King’s Judges.

1133. After enumerating these seven cases of treason the Statute expressly prohibits other cases being treated as treasons without the authority of the King and Parliament.

1134. Of these seven clauses the first two were omitted as it was considered unlikely for the English King to visit India,<sup>4</sup> which, however, His Majesty did in the cold season of 1912.

1135. Offences mentioned in clauses (v) and (vi) are not high treasons by any means, and they have been relegated to their proper place in the Code. The two remaining clauses (iv) and (vii) have, however, been enacted here in their modified form as sections 122 to 124.

1136. Meaning of Words.—“Whoever wages war” : The word “whoever” is acknowledged to be a substitute for “if a man” in the Statute of Treasons<sup>5</sup> and has been used to include both British subjects and foreigners. “Wages war” is similarly acknowledged to be a substitute for “levying war” in the English Statute, and is used in the same sense.<sup>6</sup> It is to be understood in its ordinary sense, and overt acts, such as collection of men, arms and ammunition for that purpose, do not amount to waging war.<sup>1</sup> “Attempts to wage such war”: What is an attempt? It is something more than a mere preparation. It is a definite commencement of war. “Abets the waging of such war”: The term “abets” is used in the sense defined in section 107.

1137. Persons Bound.—This section applies to “whoever” wages war against the King,—a word which has been advisedly chosen, and which unmistakably applies to British subjects as well as foreigners, the former owing allegiance by birth or naturalisation, the latter by their residence. In this respect, the Code follows the English Law and it is in accordance with de jure gentium<sup>2</sup> which admits the right of the foreigners to enter the country only upon the tacit condition that as they rely upon its protection, they also subject themselves to its laws.<sup>3</sup> The law above stated relates to alien residents. But it is different in the case of an alien enemy who invades the other state, because his own state is at war with it. Such a person may be killed in war, or if he is caught alive, he is, and must be held, as a prisoner of war. But a foreigner may take up arms without the sanction of his state, which is in fact on friendly terms with the state he is attacking. Such a one is called an alien amy and may be killed, if found arms in hand, otherwise he cannot be killed without a trial. The trial may be held by a Court-martial, if the ordinary laws of the land have been legally suspended, otherwise it must be held by the civil Courts and under the ordinary law.

1138. The subject of a state cannot throw over allegiance by joining the armed forces of an alien enemy or a lawful belligerent and plead that he could not be tried as an ordinary rebel.<sup>4</sup> But this is not an invariable rule, for a British subject may be naturalized in a foreign state, in which case, he ceases to owe any allegiance to the King and will be treated, in every respect, as a foreigner.<sup>5</sup>

1139. Lastly, as remarked by Mr. Forsythe, allegiance by the English Law is correlative with protection,<sup>6</sup> and “where the Sovereign can no longer de jure protect his subjects, their allegiance ceases. Upon this principle allegiance ceases by conquest, or by cession of territory under a treaty.”<sup>7</sup>

1140. What is “Waging War”.—Turning next to the phrase “waging war,” it will be observed that the section deals with three stages of complicity in waging war against the King, namely, abetment, attempt and actual war. The offence of abetment is under this section a distinct and complete offence. This was justified by the Law Commissioners in the following words: “We have made the abetting of hostilities against the Government in certain cases, a separate offence, instead of leaving it to the operation of the general law laid down in the chapter on abetment. We have done so for two reasons. In the first place, war may be waged against the Government by persons in whom it is no offence to wage such war, by foreign princes and their subjects. Our general rules on the subject of abetment would apply to the case of a person residing in the British territories, who should abet a subject of the British Government in waging war against that Government; but they should not reach the case of a person who, while residing in the British territories, should abet the waging of war by any foreign prince against the British Government.

1141. “In the second place, we agree with the great body of legislators in thinking, that though in general a person who has been a party to a criminal design, which has not been carried into effect, ought not to be punished as

(1) Barindra, 37 C. 467.

(2) Allegiance follows protection as a matter of course: Protectio trahit subjectionem, et subjectio protectionem (“Allegiance and protection are reciprocally due from subject and the sovereign”)—Calvin's case, 7 Rep. 1. It is a right which, says Sir Michael Foster, “the law of nature giveth, and no law of society hath taken away.”

severely as if that design had been carried into effect, yet an exception to this rule must be made with respect to high offences against the State for State-crimes and especially the most heinous and formidable State-crimes have this peculiarity that, if they are successfully committed the criminal is almost always secure from punishment. The murderer is in greater danger after victim is despatched than before. The thief is in greater danger after the purse is taken than before. But the rebel is out of danger as soon as he has subverted the Government. As the penal law is impotent against a successful rebel, it is consequently necessary that it should be made strong and sharp against the first beginnings of rebellion, against reasonable designs which have been carried no further than plots and preparations. We have, therefore, not thought it expedient to leave such plots and preparations to the ordinary law of abetment. That law is framed on principles which, though they appear to us quite sound, as respects the great majority of offences, would be inapplicable here. Under that general law a conspiracy for the subversion of the Government, would not be punished at all if the conspirators were detected before they had done more than discuss plans, adopt resolutions and interchange promises of fidelity. A conspiracy for the subversion of the Government, which should be carried as far as the Gunpowder treason, or the assassination plot against William III, would be punished very much less severely than the counterfeiting of a rupee, or the presenting of a forged cheque. We have therefore, thought it absolutely necessary to make separate provision for the previous abetting of great State offences. The subsequent abetting of such offences may, we think, without inconvenience, be left to be dealt with according to the general law.”<sup>1</sup>

1142. Since this was written, a new section has been added to the Code making conspiracies to commit offences under this section punishable.<sup>2</sup> The combined effect of the two sections is then to make conspiracies, abetment and attempt to wage war as much punishable as the actual waging of war itself. It will be convenient to discuss here the effect of these several acts as, in spite of the illogical arrangement of the sections, they all form an integral branch of a subject in which the different degrees of criminality depend upon the different degrees of development that a plot to overthrow the Government may have attained. In its normal evolution a plot to wage war must begin with a conspiracy in which the ways and means are discussed and settled. It requires at least two persons to conspire; but there is no limit to their number. If there are five or more persons in a conspiracy it then becomes an “unlawful assembly.”<sup>3</sup> A conspiracy is by its nature secret in its organization. But it may be incited by words which may or may not be publicly spoken or published. Even these words do not go unpunished.<sup>4</sup> The Code then punishes as lese majestie not only cabals and conspiracies, but even words spoken or written to excite disaffection towards the Government. Thus, the Legislature maintains a tight grip on all hostile combinations, added to which the Viceroy possesses the power of deporting persons whom he may suspect of exciting or promoting external or internal commotion.<sup>5</sup> As this power may be exercised without a trial, without warning, and without the offender, if a native, having recourse to the habeas corpus,<sup>6</sup> or the writ of mainprize,<sup>7</sup> the executive Government often find it a readier weapon to use than the more deliberate procedure of a trial. But the exercise of such power, though legal, is extraordinary, and there is nothing like it in English law. And in recent years it has been considered that its exercise has in some cases led to its abuse. The procedure under the Code, is therefore, the only regular way of combating conspiracies.

1143. Criminal Conspiracy to Wage War.—Such a conspiracy may consist of secret or open combination to (i) levy or attempt to levy war against the King, or it may have for its object (ii) the overthrow of the Government, or (iii) the overawing by means of criminal force, or the show of criminal force, the Government of India or any Local Government.<sup>1</sup> In order then that a conspiracy should be punishable, it must be shown to possess one or more of these objects. Otherwise a conspiracy is not otherwise punishable under the Code, unless it amounts to an abetment, that is, unless it is accompanied by an act or illegal omission.<sup>2</sup> In England, a conspiracy to levy war is not treason though, if the design and conspiracy be either to kill or depose, imprison or restrain the King, and if the way and method of effecting these is by levying war for that purpose, then it is high treason though no war be levied. But there may be a war levied without any design upon the King's person. As, for example, if persons do assemble and act with force in opposition to some law which they think inconvenient, and hope thereby to get it repealed, it is levying a war and treason, though purposing and designing it would not be treason in England,<sup>3</sup> though it is a declared offence under the next section.

1144. There is really no difference between the English and Indian law. The former makes it treason to overawe the King, while the latter makes it similarly a grave offence to overawe the Central and Local Governments, which are the only substitutes of the King in this country. There is, however, one material difference between the two systems. Under the English rule, there must be evidence of an overt act, while under the explanation to s. 124-A, there need be no act or illegal omission to make conspiracy an offence. Again, in England, at least two witnesses are required for a conviction, but there is no such rule here. It will have to be presently considered as to what constitutes the overawing, by means of criminal force, the Government. Here it is only necessary to observe that a plot to levy war, though it may not amount to abetment is punishable as an offence. If, therefore, A and B decide to wage war, though they may lack the power, and though it may have been a passing thought, still they are guilty of an offence. Blackstone speaks of the tyrant as having executed a subject Dionysis, barely for dreaming that he had killed him, which was held for a sufficient proof that he had thought thereof in his waking hours."<sup>4</sup> "But such," he says, "is not the temper of the English Law, in which an open or overt act is required to convict the traitor." It has been already stated that no such overt act is here required, and if two merely agree to levy war, the offence is complete under the Code, though it may not be under English Law. Of course, a person may join a conspiracy after it has been formed or leave it at any time before the conspirators wage war in which case he could not be convicted under this section.<sup>5</sup>

1145. Preparation, Attempt, and Levying of War.—Indeed, the mere agreement of the two would be an "act" sufficient to constitute an abetment under this Code (§§ 952, 954). Consequently, even such an agreement is not required to constitute an offence under the next section. As preparation is something more than an agreement, it is sufficient to constitute an offence under the next section, though it will probably then also amount to abetment. Such preparation may consist of the collection of men, arms and ammunition, sketches and plans of forts and government buildings, of roads, bridges and the like—in fact, of all such materials as are required for the purpose of war. Even the collection of supplies may afford some evidence of the design though, without more, it would not prove the crime (§§ 963, 970). A conspiracy may thus lead to abetment, of an abetment of an attempt which is a direct hostile movement in contemplation of the war. In view of the far-reaching law, it is probably not necessary to draw a very clear line between an abetment and an attempt, though a distinction may be usefully drawn between a conspiracy and an abetment (§§ 964, 968, 969). For the present purpose, any conspiracy with an overt act will amount to an abetment. An assembly armed and arrayed in a war-like manner for any treasonable purpose would be guilty of an attempt to wage war ; and so lifting and marching, without coming to a battle or an action, have been held to be sufficient overt acts within the requirements of the English Statute.<sup>1</sup> For this purpose, no specified number of persons is necessary.<sup>2</sup> Indeed, one person possessed of a weapon of precision may work more mischief than a whole battalion of troops indifferently armed. The offence consists not in the number of men or their manner or equipment as in the inclination of their mind. So Foster says : “ There is no difference between those insurrections, which have carried the appearance of any army formed under leaders and provided with military weapons and with drums, colours, etc., and those other disorderly tumultuous assemblies which have been drawn together and conducted for purposes manifestly unlawful, but without any of the ordinary show and apparatus of war before mentioned.....In the case of Damaree<sup>3</sup> and Purchase,<sup>4</sup> there was nothing given in evidence of the usual pageantry of war, no military weapons, no banners, nor drums, nor any previous consultation previous to the rising ; and yet the want of these circumstances weighed nothing with the Court, though the prisoner’s counsel insisted much on that matter. The number of insurgents supplied the want of military weapons, and they were provided with axes, crowes and other tools of the like nature, proper for the mischief they intended to effect : Furor arma ministrat. The true criterion, therefore, in all these cases is : Qui animo, Did the parties assemble ? ”<sup>5</sup>

1146. The specific intention is then the essence of the offence. The number of men assembled, their war-cries, their arms and accoutrements may be evidence of their intention, but nevertheless it is upon the prosecution to furnish and establish that the intention of the accused was to levy war. Indeed, every hostile act of a person against the men or measure of Government cannot be magnified into the waging of war against the King. “ There is a diversity between levying of war and committing of a great riot, a rout or an unlawful assembly. For example, as if three, or four or more do rise to burn or put down an enclosure in Dale, which the lord of the Manor in Dale hath made there in that particular place ; this or the like is a riot a rout or an unlawful assembly, and no treason. But if they had risen of purpose to alter religion established within the realm or laws, or to go from town to town generally, and to cast down enclosures, this is levying of war (though there be no great number of the conspirators within the purview of this Statute), because the pretence is public and general and not private in particular.”<sup>6</sup> The old reports are full of cases in which attempts were made to enlarge the rule by establishing a constructive treason, but neither the Judges nor the jurists have ever tolerated such an extension of the doctrine. So Lord Hale wrote : “ How dangerous it is by construction and analogy to make treason, where the letter of the law has not done it. For such a method admits of no limits or bounds, but runs as far and wide as the wit and invention of accusers and the detestation of persons accused will carry man.”<sup>7</sup>

1147. There is, however, one sense in which the language of the section may be said to necessarily countenance constructive treason. The section says, “ Whoever wages war against the King ” which must mean against the person of the King. Now there can be no war against the King in this sense in India, for the King is not here, though his Government is. Strictly speaking there can be no waging of war against the King, and the inapt expression here is only a remainder that the section was closely copied from the Statute of Treasons, which was passed at a time when the power and position of the King was very different to what it is now. Such war is, therefore, only constructively possible here, as indeed, it is in England under the altered Constitution. So Lord Mansfield, L. C., told the jury in Lord George Gordon's case: "There are two kinds of levying war—one, against the person of the King: to imprison, to dethrone, or to kill him, or to make him change measures or remove counsellors; the other, which is said to be levied against the Majesty of the King, or, in other words, his legal capacity; as when a multitude rise and assemble to attain by force and violence any object of a general public nature, that is levying war against the Majesty of the King; most reasonably so held, because it tends to dissolve all the bonds of society, to destroy property and to overturn Government, and by force of arms to restrain the King from reigning according to law."<sup>1</sup>

1148. Three Elements in Levying War.—The foregoing discussion, would then, support the following rules:—

- (1) That the word "King" in the section must not be understood in its literal sense, as it is used in the figurative sense as meaning, head of the State, and as the external embodiment of lawful constitution and Government.
- (2) That there can be no waging of war against the King, unless it amounts to an insurrection against the State or its measures, which must be manifested by the generality of design.
- (3) That there can be no waging of war where the attack is personal and particular, and not general and subversive of the State or its authority.

1149. The first rule has been made sufficiently clear and calls for no further comment. The second rule requires further discussion. It has been stated that there is no waging of war against the King, when the object was to redress a private wrong or to procure some private advantage. Riots between two great factions, however lawless or violent, are of this nature. Such riots frequently take place in this country over land, or crops or other disputed right to property. Such rioters may even defy the authorities called in to restore peace. They may even attack them in the fury of the moment. But they do not on that account cease to be rioters, nor does their offence cease to be rioting. But it is not necessarily always so. For the rioters may gain courage by the success they may have achieved and they may transfer their grievance from their opponents to the authorities and commence burning down offices, force jails and release prisoners. It would then be no longer a riot, but shall have become a war, in which the participants may or may not observe the laws and courtesies of war.

1150. Such was really the origin of the American War of Independence. It began in a series of riots which all developed into a great war.<sup>2</sup> The Lord George Gordon riots did not assume that magnitude. But nevertheless, the facts found were held to be sufficient to hold the rioters guilty of levying war. These riots originated in the repeal of an Act whereby the disabilities under which the Roman Catholics had laboured were all removed.<sup>3</sup> This emancipation of the Roman Catholics aroused bitter hostility from the Protestants, who created riots in various parts of the country. The said Lord was a leader of a Scottish party. It was not denied on his part that the alleged facts, if proved, would constitute the levying of war. He, however, disputed the facts on which he was acquitted.<sup>4</sup> In Frost's case also, there was no evidence of compassing and designing to put down the authority of the Queen, but it was only a rising to proclaim Chartism as the law of the land. The accused was, therefore, acquitted.<sup>5</sup>

1151. These facts would, however, constitute an offence under section 124 of the Code, as they would at least amount to the overawing the Government by criminal force. In two other cases the collecting of men, and their pulling down houses was held to amount to the levying of war,<sup>1</sup> but these were cases of constructive treason, and their correctness was questioned by contemporary jurists.<sup>2</sup>

1152. Still less justifiable was the decision in which an attack being made on the conspirators to overthrow the British Government, by the Police with a view to arresting them, the latter defended themselves attacking and fighting their arrestors. Their attack was held to constitute the waging of war under this section, but it is clear that in attacking the Police, their object was merely to get rid of them.<sup>3</sup>

1153. Sedition and Abetting War.—So long as a man only tries to inflame feeling to excite a state of mind, he is not guilty of anything more than sedition. It is only when he definitely and clearly incites to action that he can be held to be guilty of instigating and therefore of abetting the waging of war. The main purpose of the instigation should be the waging of war. It should not be merely a remote and incidental purpose, but the thing principally aimed at by the instigator. Where the speech delivered by the accused amounted at the worst to a prophecy or even a threat that violence may be necessary in future and did not suggest action here and now or stimulate any one to such action, it is not an abetment of war.<sup>4</sup>

121-A. Whoever within or without British India conspires to commit any of the offences punishable by section 121, or to deprive the Queen of the sovereignty of British India or of any part thereof, or conspires to overawe, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, the Government of India or any Local Government, shall be punished with transportation for life or any shorter term, or with imprisonment of either description which may extend to ten years, [and shall also be liable to fine.]<sup>5</sup>

Explanation.—To constitute a conspiracy under this section, it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission shall take place in pursuance thereof.

1154. Analogous Law.—This section which follows the English Law<sup>6</sup> is new and was added by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act of 1870.<sup>7</sup> It is declared subject to the provisions of Chapters IV, V and XXIII, of the Code.<sup>8</sup> Sir James Stephen, who was then the law-member and as such responsible for the amendment, says that it was intended as the equivalent of the English Treason-Felony Act.<sup>9</sup> This Statute<sup>10</sup> was passed to get rid of an anomaly that existed in the English Law under which, while levying war against the King was treason, conspiracy to levy war against him was a mere misdemeanour. This anomaly was recognised, but its effect was attempted to be got over by treating a conspiracy to levy war against the King as an overt act of compassing the King's death, and thereby falling within the Statute of Treasons. But this was the introduction of "constructive treason" odious to English law,<sup>11</sup> on which the cases in the reports are bewilderingly contradictory, but they need no longer be referred to in view of the Legislation of 1848.

1155. Procedure and Practice.—This is another section in which no Court can take cognizance of the offence unless upon complaint made by the order of, or under authority from, the Governor-General in Council, the Local Government or some officer empowered by the Governor-General in Council in this behalf.<sup>1</sup> Where the Complainant omitted to name an accused person in his petition of complaint made with the sanction of the Local Government to prosecute for offences falling within this and the following next two sections, it was held that the accused not so named stood discharged from the trial initiated on such a complaint, even though his name appeared in the sanction authorising the complaint. Nor could such defect be remedied by a subsequent application applying for the issue of a process against such an accused.<sup>2</sup>

1156. An offence under this section is not cognizable, but a warrant may issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable, and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

1157. Proof.—The points to be proved are :—

- (1) That the accused had conspired ;
- (2) That the conspiracy related to an offence described in s. 121, or was to deprive the King of his sovereignty or to overawe by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force the Central or Local Government.

In this connection it may be noted that :—

- (3) The act and statements of a co-conspirator are admissible against others, provided that it is established that the former was a member of the same conspiracy as the latter,
- (4) and that the act was done in furtherance of the conspiracy.

Conspiracy may then be proved in either of two or both ways, that is—

- (a) By direct evidence, in which case the acts and statements of one co-conspirator are admissible against other members of the conspiracy ; or

- (b) it may be established by proof of the acts of the different persons.

1158. Charge.—A charge of conspiracy under this section with persons “known and unknown” is bad in law ; since the charge must state the names of persons known.<sup>3</sup> The charge for an offence under this section may be worded thus :—

“I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name the accused) as follows :—

“That you——on or about the——day of——at——(if the place is within British India, mention so), conspired to wage war (or to abet the waging of war against the Emperor of India (or conspired to deprive the Emperor of his sovereignty of British India or some part thereof, or conspired to overawe by means of criminal force or show of criminal force, the Government of India or of the Local Government, in which case specify the act constituting the offence), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 121-A of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

1159. Principle.—Prior to the enactment of this section, a conspiracy, as such, was not punishable otherwise than as an abetment and for that purpose it was necessary to prove that any act or illegal omission had taken place in pursuance of the conspiracy. Under this section seditious conspiracy is punishable as a substantive offence, and apart from any act or illegal omission that may have taken place in pursuance thereof. This section has thus provided a special punishment for an act which may not even amount to the abetment of an offence, but which the Legislature regards a heinous crime in view of the grave consequence which it may otherwise entail.

1160. Meaning of Words.—“Whoever,” for the meaning of which see s. 121. “Within or without British India”: As to the power of the Government of India to punish ex-territorial offences, see s. 4. “To deprive the Queen of the sovereignty of British India”: This is the echo of the English Statute against conspiracies,<sup>1</sup> in which the corresponding phrase is “to deprive or depose him (King) or them (his successors) from the style, honour or the King’s name of the Imperial Crown of this realm, or of any other of His Majesty’s dominions or countries.” “To overawe by means of criminal force”: This phrase has been also used in section 141, and means that the force used is to put the Government concerned in awe, so that it fears to do that which it has a mind and will to do, and which the law empowers it to do.

1161. Treasonable Conspiracy.—A conspiracy has been before defined to be a combination by two or more persons to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means<sup>2</sup> (§ 964). The subject of treasonable conspiracy had in part to be anticipated in the foregoing discussion for the purposes of tracing treason to its genesis (§ 1140). A treasonable conspiracy must be at least a conspiracy or agreement between two or more persons to subvert the existing Central Government or to overawe it or the various Local Governments.<sup>3</sup> A conspiracy of this description has necessarily as its goal some political and general purpose, and not merely a private or personal advantage. This is, however the object which may not be always apparent. Its object may be, indeed, professedly religious, but if it offends against the rule, it will be treated as a conspiracy, whatever may have been its purpose and object.

1162. Such was the conspiracy unearthed in 1871 in the well-known Wahabe case,<sup>4</sup> in which the accused Amir Khan had been convicted for conspiring with certain frontier fanatics for the waging of war in British India. Ameer Khan was a religious fanatic and his object in compassing the overthrow of the British Government was Jehad<sup>5</sup> as a part of his pious duty as inculcated in the Kuran.<sup>6</sup> He was convicted and his conviction was upheld by the High Court where Couch, C.J., with two other Judges, held that the conspiracy had been proved (a) by the evidence of accomplices which was supported by (b) the letters written to and by Ameer Khan at the time of the conspiracy and relating thereto. The admissibility of these letters had been objected to on the ground that they had been discovered after the arrest, but it was held that they were admissible, if their previous existence was proved. It was also laid down that the acts and statements of all persons engaged in a conspiracy constituted the evidence of res gestæ against each of the conspirators.<sup>7</sup>

1163. Actual Injury Immaterial.—It is not of the essence of the offence of such conspiracy that the accused was prompted by patriotic attachment to his own country, or that his acts had not produced any effect.<sup>8</sup> As Kenyon, C.J., said “The criminality did not rest on an invitation to the French to invade the country. If according to Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Hensey,<sup>9</sup> the communication was likely to be of use to the French to enable them to annoy us, defend themselves or shape their attacks, sending such a paper with a view of its going to the enemy was undoubtedly high treason.<sup>10</sup> In this case as in another<sup>11</sup> the charge was that the accused had collected intelligence as to the disposition of the British naval and military forces and of the sailings of the British squadron, and sent it by special messengers to the French King who was then at war with England. The communications, however, being intercepted, never reached their destination but it was considered to be immaterial, for the offence consists in the attempt to injure and not in the injury done.<sup>12</sup> But the attempt must be criminal, for there can be no conspiracy without criminality, and such criminality cannot be inferred from the holding of mere correspondence with the King’s enemies, unless it shows betrayal to them some state secret likely to be turned to account against the King. For as Holt, C. J., told the jury "loose words spoken, without relation to any act or design are not treason or an overt act; but arguments and persuasion to engage in such design or resolution, and directing or proposing the best way for effecting it, are overt acts of high treason inasmuch as if two agree together to kill the King, though the agreement be verbal only, and not reduced to writing; likewise, consulting together for such a purpose is an overt act of treason."<sup>1</sup>

122. Whoever collects men, arms or ammunition or otherwise prepares to wage war with the intention of either waging or being prepared to wage war against the Queen, shall be punished with transportation for life or imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, [and shall also be liable to fine.]<sup>2</sup>

1164. Analogous Law.—This is one of the case in which a mere preparation to commit an offence, i.e., of waging war against the King is an offence under the Code. The section is in accordance with English law, under which the collection of men and materials will be an "overt act" to compass, imagine and intend to depose the king which is the test of criminality. So in a Council of nine Judges the majority of seven held one Patrick Harding guilty of treason for having hired sixteen men to wage war against the joint Sovereigns (William and Mary) in 1691. In that year the English were at war with the French King who was supporting the restoration of James, and Harding had procured men and sent them across the channel to join the French army, whereupon he was convicted of treason.<sup>3</sup>

1165. Procedure and Practice.—All offences under this chapter (except s. 127) require the complaint made by order of or under authority from the Government for the valid prosecution of the accused.<sup>4</sup> The offence under this section is not cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is not bailable, not compoundable, and is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Court of Session.

1166. Proof.—The points to be proved in an offence under this section are :—

- (1) That the accused collected men, arms, etc.;
- (2) That he did so to wage war;
- (3) That such war was against the King.

1167. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That you—on or about the—day of—at—collected men (or arms or ammunition) (if any other means were adopted, mention them) with the intention of waging war (or being prepared to wage war) against the Emperor of India, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 122 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

1168. Principle.—This section is intended to nip treason in the bud, by visiting with high penalty, a preparation for waging war whether immediately or in the future. A person who collects arms to wage war in some remote future is as much within the prohibition of the section as one who is ready to declare war as soon as his preparations are complete. As to collection of men and arms does not necessarily signify a desire to wage war against the King, the presence of such an intention is material in constituting an offence under this section. Even where the accused is shown to have had no such intention, if a native, he may be dealt with under the provisions of the Indian Arms Act for which, however, the sanction of the District Magistrate is necessary.

(1) Charnock, 12 St. Tr. 1377 (1452).

(2) The words "and shall also be liable to fine" were substituted for the words, "and shall forfeit his property" by s. 2 of the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XVI of 1921) which came into force on the 29th September 1921.

(3) Patrick Harding, 12 St. Tr. 645, note.

(4) S. 196 Cr. P. C.

1169. The offence under this section does not depend upon the quality of the arms and ammunition, or upon their precision or efficiency. A person who collects bows and arrows, axes and catapults would be as much within the rule as another who collect Mauser rifles or Howitzer machine guns; only in the one case the Government may not consider it advisable to sanction prosecution, while in the other it may measure its security by the nature of the threatened danger.

1170. Bombs are not ammunition within the meaning of the section, but a person who collects bombs may be charged for "otherwise preparing to wage war," if the other ingredients essential to constitute the offence are present. A person who collects bombs with the intention of using them against obnoxious or high officers of Government may undoubtedly be guilty of an offence under the last section, but it is doubtful if he can be said to thereby wage war against the King.

123. Whoever by any act, or by any illegal omission, conceals the existence of a design to wage war against the Queen, intending by such concealment to facilitate, or knowing it to be likely that such concealment will facilitate, the waging of such war, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

1171. Analogous Law.—This section is the adaptation of section 118 which lays down the general rule on the subject and from which it is scarcely distinguishable.

1172. Under section 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure every person aware of the commission of, or of the intention of, any other person to commit any offence made punishable amongst others, under sections 121, 121-A, 122, 123, 124, 124-A, 125, 126 and 130 is bound to give information to the nearest police-officer or Magistrate of such commission or intention.

For a general commentary on this section see section 118.

1173. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section requires the complaint made by order of or authority from the Government before prosecution.<sup>1</sup> It is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable, non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

1174. Proof.—The points requiring proof under this section are :—

- (1) The existence of a design to wage war against the King;
- (2) That the accused knew of such design;
- (3) That he concealed the same;
- (4) That he thereby—
  - (a) intended to facilitate the waging of such war; or
  - (b) that he knew that it was likely that such concealment would facilitate the same.

1175. Charge.—The charge may be framed as follows :—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.), charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That you—knowing that on or about—day of—at—certain persons had designed to wage war against the Emperor, concealed the existence of the said design by (specify the act or omission) intending by such concealment to facilitate (or knowing it to be likely that such concealment would facilitate) the waging of such war, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 123 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

124. Whoever, with the intention of inducing or compelling the Governor-General of India, or the Governor of any Presidency or a Lieutenant-Governor, or a Member of the Council of the Governor-General of India, or of the Council of any presidency, to exercise or refrain from exercising in any manner any of the lawful powers of such Governor-General, Governor, Lieutenant Governor or Member of Council, assaults or wrongfully restrains or attempts wrongfully to restrain or overawes, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, or attempts so to overawe, such Governor-General, Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, or Member of Council.

shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Wrongful Restraint—s. 339. Assaults—s. 351.]

1176. Analogous Law.—This section is again an enlargement of section 121-A, which covers most of what is made punishable under this section, which was clause 3 of the original draft bill and has been, therefore, probably allowed to stand.

1177. Procedure and Proof.—No prosecution under this section can be instituted without the previous complaint made by order of, or authority from, the Government.<sup>1</sup> The offence is non-cognizable but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

1178. The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) Assault or attempt, etc., by the accused ;
- (2) That the person assaulted, etc., was one of the persons described in the section ;
- (3) That the assault, etc., was with the intention of inducing or compelling the persons to exercise or refrain from exercising his lawful power.

1179. Charge.—The charge may be framed as follows :—

“ I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That you——on or about the——day of——at——with the intention of inducing (here enter the name and designation of the person wronged) to induce him to exercise (or refrain him from exercising a lawful power) as such governor (or as the case may be) assaulted him and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 124 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

1180. Assault on High Officers.—This section has been enacted to provide a specially deterrent sentence for an assault or wrongful restraint committed on high officers of Government who are required for carrying on the administration of the country and who should be free from the fear of personal harm while discharging their legal duties. The protection only extends to them so long as they exercise any of their lawful powers, it being immaterial if they were rightly or properly exercised. If, however, the assault was committed to induce the person to refrain from exercising an unlawful power, the assailant would have to be dealt with under the ordinary law.

1181. It may be noted that as they stand, the words “ inducing or compelling ” qualify both the words “ to exercise or refrain from exercising ” any of the lawful powers, the result being that a person may be visited with the condign punishment provided by the section, not only for inducing or compelling a person to refrain from exercising his lawful power, but also for inducing or compelling him to exercise them ; in other words, for inducing or compelling him to do his duty. This may appear hard but such is the meaning.

1182. The term “ whoever ” in this section would naturally be persons amenable to the jurisdiction of the Indian Courts. Otherwise, the offence may be committed though there may be no Court competent to try the offender. Such a case arose in 1779 out of a deadlock created in the Madras Council owing to the arbitrary action of Lord Pigot, Governor of Madras, who refused to sign the proceedings of his Council, and who was thereupon arrested and confined for a period of eight months till his death. On the motion of his brother, the House of Commons prayed the King to order the prosecution of his Councillors which was done. The Councillors were all convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of £1,000 each, by Lord Mansfield who held that the imprisonment was not justified by necessity, which alone would have justified their action, and that, in the absence of such necessity, the Councillors were guilty of treason.<sup>1</sup>

124-A. Whoever by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representation, or otherwise, brings or attempts to bring into hatred or contempt, or excites or attempts to excite disaffection towards, Her Majesty or the Government established by law in British India, shall be punished with transportation for life or any shorter term, to which fine may be added or with imprisonment which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added or with fine.

Explanation 1.—The expression “disaffection” includes disloyalty and all feelings of enmity.

Explanation 2.—Comments expressing disapprobation of the measures of the Government with a view to obtain their alteration, by lawful means, without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.

Explanation 3.—Comments expressing disapprobation of the administrative or other action of the Government without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.

1183. Analogous Law.—The original s. 124-A which was inserted by Act XXVII of 1870, s. 5 was repealed by s. 4 of the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act, 1898<sup>2</sup> and this section substituted for it. Chapters IV and V of this Code apply to offences punishable under this section.<sup>3</sup>

1184. This section defines the offence of sedition which is punishable as seditious libel under English law from which its provisions have been borrowed; and since it adopts the leading words of the statute, the meaning of which have long been settled, it should be interpreted in the light of that law. But while it is so, English Law presents some noticeable divergence which should not be overlooked. In the first place, the law of sedition is regarded in England as a branch of the law of defamation, and as English law makes the difference between spoken and written libel, the same difference marks the laws of seditious libel which, however, is absent from the Code. So while it is perfectly true to say in England that words merely spoken against the King or his ministers cannot amount to treason,<sup>4</sup> it will be absurd to apply the rule to India. But even in England, there are cases to show that words merely spoken amount to sedition if they refer to the King, though they will not, if they referred to any other leading public character.<sup>5</sup> Again, in the former case it cannot be pleaded as a defence that the words are true, though in the case of the latter truth will be a sufficient justification. An exhaustive historical retrospect leading to the enactment of this section will be found set out in the previous edition of this work.<sup>6</sup>

1185. Supplementary Provisions.—This section applies, not only to a person committing an offence against the Government established in British India but also against the ruling Prince of an Indian State, by reason of an enactment known as the “Indian States (Protection against Disaffection) Act of 1922<sup>7</sup>” In addition to this section enacted to punish sedition, there is section 108 of the Criminal Procedure Code, under which persons may be prevented from disseminating seditious matter.

1186. Procedure and Practice.—This section is one of those in which no Court can take cognizance of the offence “unless upon the complaint made by order of, or under authority from the Governor-General in Council, the Local Government, or some officer empowered by the Governor-General in Council in this behalf.”<sup>1</sup> As regards this section it has been held that the order or sanction required need not necessarily specify the seditious matter in respect of which the prosecution has been ordered or sanctioned, and that, even were it otherwise, the section bars only the “cognizance” and not its trial after committal.<sup>2</sup> But the sanction or complaint is only required to prevent vexatious prosecution. It does not take the place of a complaint which must conform to its legal requirement,<sup>3</sup> which alone initiates the prosecution, and upon the fact of which the Magistrate is empowered to act. A commitment of the accused upon the evidence recorded before the sanction of Government is therefore obviously illegal.<sup>4</sup>

1187. The venue of the offence is laid where the sedition was written or spoken or where it was published by the authority or with the assent of the accused.<sup>5</sup> In this respect too the procedure follows the analogy of defamation.

1188. An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable. It is triable by the Court of Session, Chief Presidency Magistrate, or District Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class specially empowered by the Local Government in that behalf.

1189. An accused person may be legally tried and convicted at one trial under this section and section 153-A on charges framed on three disconnected articles published in a newspaper.<sup>6</sup> A trial for sedition under this section should be by a special jury.<sup>7</sup>

1190. Proof.—The points requiring proof in a case under this section are :—

- (1) That the accused wrote or spoke the words or made the signs or representations or did some other act complained of.
- (2) That the accused thereby brought or attempted to bring into hatred or contempt; or excited or attempted to excite disaffection.
- (3) That such disaffection was towards the King or Government of India.

1191. The publication of seditious matter may be proved by proof of the manuscript being in the handwriting of the accused and proof that it was printed and published although there be no evidence that the printing and publication was by the direction of the accused. Nor it is necessary to prove that the matter was actually posted.<sup>8</sup> But where the accused had posted such matter; but its delivery was intercepted, the offence would only amount to an attempt.<sup>9</sup> But it would amount to publication, if the matter addressed not to a private individual but to the representative of a large number of men (e.g., Captain of a School) is opened by anybody.<sup>10</sup>

1192. Charge.—The charge under this section may be framed as follows :—

 “ That you—on or about—day of—at—by writing or speaking) the words (mention them, or by signs or by visible representation or otherwise) brought, or attempted to bring) into hatred or contempt or excited or attempted to excite disaffection towards) His Majesty the Emperor or the Government established by law in British India) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 124-A of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance for the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

1193. Principle.—Sedition is nothing but libel though it is not subject to the same rule. Where a person is defamed he is punishable under s. 500 ; if a libel affects a class or community, it would be an offence under s. 153-A ; if it is of the state, it is an offence under this section. Sedition is nothing but defamation of the established Government. It is, indeed, therefore, called seditious libel in England. The essence of the offence is the intention to excite disaffection towards the Government. The offence owes its gravity to the fact that it is calculated to foster and promote popular discontent, and that such discontent leads to insurrection and revolution. At the same time, no Government can safely place itself beyond criticism. Such restrictive legislation would defeat the very object it was intended to serve. Consequently, the Legislature recognizes the right of the public to criticize its acts and measures, but such criticism may be strong but not malignant, nor should it be made a theme for exciting popular discontent against the very Government.<sup>1</sup> A person may express an opinion hostile to Government ; it is not sedition ; but it becomes sedition the moment it affects its vital existence. Thus a statement “ we must mend this Government ” is not seditious, but a statement “ we must mend or end this Government ” may be so. The incitement of disaffection, of course, depends not only upon the words spoken, as on the time when, the place where, and the manner in which they are spoken.

1194. Meaning of Words.—“ Whoever.....brings,” which has been held to include not only the author but also the printer and publisher of sedition. But since no one can be said to bring another into contempt without intending or knowing it, a person who prints or publishes matter in ignorance of its seditious character cannot be held liable under the section (§ 1200). “ By words either spoken or written, or by signs or visible representation ” : Compare the opening words of section 499 which are similar. Sedition may be published by speech or writing, pictures, woodcuts or engraving of any kind.<sup>2</sup> The exhibition of flags is a mode of using “ signs or visible representations.”<sup>3</sup> What about the seditious speech published by gramophone ? Would it be publication by signs ? No. But it will be publication “ otherwise. ” “ Brings into hatred or contempt ” : Its “ hatred ” may lead people to rebel for its overthrow, and its “ contempt ” may induce the people to defy its mandate. “ Excites disaffection ” : These words are taken from the English Statute and are intended to cover the same ground. They imply nothing short of disloyalty. “ The Government established by law in British India ” : It includes not only the system but also the persons taken collectively who govern<sup>4</sup> (§ 1218).

1195. What is Sedition.—This section defines and at the same time prescribes the punishment for sedition. But in defining the offence it uses words the meanings of which have still to be investigated. For instance, it speaks of hatred, contempt and disaffection, but at the same time it speaks of disapprobation without exciting hatred, contempt and disaffection. Then again, it speaks of “ bringing or attempting to bring the Government into hatred or contempt.” When is a person said to “ bring ” or attempt to bring Government into hatred or contempt, and what is to be understood by these terms ; and when is a person said to “ excite ” or “ attempt to excite ” disaffection towards the Government, and what is disaffection, and what is disapprobation without being disaffection, hatred or contempt, —these are the questions upon which the abstract rule here enunciated sheds no light. But as remarked before, these are terms which have by long usage acquired a settled meaning, upon the appreciation of which depends the proper working of the rule which as an offence, law regards only as next to treason.

1196. Sedition of the King.—It will be observed that the section speaks of sedition as directed either against His Majesty or against his Government. So far as the sedition relates to His Majesty, it is settled in England, that sedition in that case means nothing more than defamation. In other words, whatever amounts to defamation is sedition of the person defamed, the King, and Scandalum Magnatum if he be a peer of the realm, or a Judge or any great officer of the Crown.<sup>1</sup> The degree of the guilt in such cases depends upon the position of the person defamed. There is no Statute corresponding to the Scandalum Magnatum Act here, and therefore, except when the defamation relates to the king it will be treated as an ordinary offence punishable under section 500 of the Code. But defamation of the King will be punishable under this section, though in that case, it can only be on a State prosecution ordered or sanctioned by Government, as required by section 196 of the Procedure Code. Now in order to constitute this crime it has been held that the words spoken must be something more than mere words of vulgar abuse. To call the King a coward or a fool will not be a sedition.<sup>2</sup> But any words which strike at the King's private life and conduct, which impute to him any corrupt or partial views, or assigns bad motives for his policy, which insinuate that he is a tyrant, and does not take a lively interest in the welfare of his subjects, or which charge him with deliberately favouring or oppressing any individual or class of men in distinction to the rest of his subjects<sup>3</sup> which strike at the root of his title to the Crown or call his legitimacy in question will be seditious.<sup>4</sup> But to say that the King had broken his coronation oath,<sup>5</sup> or that he is a liar and a deceiver, or that he has treacherously betrayed the interests of his subjects and allies, and prostituted the honor of his Crown<sup>6</sup> or that he is insane<sup>7</sup> will be no sedition, though it will amount to defamation. But to say that the King is misled by his ministers, or that he takes an erroneous view of some great question of policy is not seditious, but as Lord Ellenborough, C.J., remarked: "It must be with perfect decency and respect, and without any imputation of bad motives."<sup>8</sup>

1197. Sedition of the State.—Even greater latitude is permitted in criticizing the Government but as the explanation makes it clear, it is a latitude and not a license. The criticism may be trenchant and incisive, but it must not go beyond what would be called a fair criticism. So where the Morning Chronicle wrote: "What a crowd of blessings rush upon one's mind that might be bestowed upon the country, in the event of a total change of system," Lord Ellenborough directed the jury that the sentence admitted of an innocent interpretation; that the fair meaning of the expression "change of system" was a change of political system, not a change in the frame of the established Government, but in the measures of policy which had been for some time pursued, "and that by 'total change of system' was certainly not meant subversion or demolition."<sup>9</sup> Here, it will be noticed, there was an attack on the system and not the frame of the Government. But everything depends upon the context, as such an attack on Imperialism may imply an attack on Government.<sup>10</sup>

1198. But where the accused wrote: "Every preacher runneth to the queen now, as though he were to be directed by her to tarry for reformations to be had for matters of the Church. If the Magistrates will agree, all is well; if they will not, they are not of the Church, and it is a shame to tarry for them, or for a Parliament or proclamation," all the Judges agreed that it was an incitement to insurrection and sedition.<sup>11</sup> The law on the subject was thus summed up by Lord Fitzgerald when he was a Judge in Ireland: "Sedition is a crime against society nearly allied to that of treason, and it frequently precedes treason by a short interval. Sedition is in itself a comprehensive term, and it embraces all those practices whether by word, deed, or writing which are calculated to disturb the tranquillity of the State and lead ignorant persons to endeavour to subvert the Government, and laws of the empire. The objects of sedition generally are, to induce discontent and insurrection, to stir up opposition to the Government, and to bring the administration of justice into contempt; and the very tendency of sedition is to incite the people to insurrection and rebellion. Sedition has been described as disloyalty in action, and the law considers as sedition all those practices which have for their object to excite discontent or disaffection, to create public disturbance, or to lead to civil war: to bring into hatred or contempt the Sovereign or the Government, the laws or constitution of the realm, and generally all endeavours to promote public disorder."<sup>1</sup>

1199. Analysis of Sedition.—In considering the question the following points call for discussion: (i) what was the intention of the speaker; (ii) what effect did his words produce; (iii) were the words such as were likely to cause disaffection, or produce hatred or contempt of Government.

1200. No Intention: No Sedition.—Sedition is a crime, and for all crime there must be criminal intent,<sup>2</sup> which is a question of fact<sup>3</sup> to be found upon the facts of each case against the accused or where there are more than one accused, against every one of them.<sup>4</sup> But such intention may be presumed if the natural and necessary consequence of the words employed is to bring into hatred or contempt the Government or to excite disaffection,<sup>5</sup> otherwise the intention may be gathered from the writing in dispute and which may be compared for that purpose with other writings and words spoken by the accused at or about the same time on the same or similar subject. But in order to use other articles than that complained of as seditious for the purpose of showing the meaning of certain expressions used in the article complained of, and also to show the intention of the writer it is necessary to show who the writer was, and that all the articles produced were by the same hand. Where the writer, printer and publisher of a newspaper are tried for this offence, it may be that the writer is guilty of sedition, but the printer and publisher cannot be punished unless it is established that the concealed object of the writer was shared by them.<sup>6</sup>

1201. So in an indictment against the accused Henry Hunt and others for unlawfully meeting together with persons unknown for the purpose of fomenting discontent and disaffection, at which meeting Hunt presided, it was held that resolutions passed at a previous meeting assembled a short time before in a distant place, and at which Hunt had also presided, and in pursuance of which the meeting charged was held, were admissible in evidence to shew the intent of the accused in attending the meeting in question.<sup>7</sup> So where the accused was charged for seditious writing, it was held to be perfectly competent to the accused to produce other writing of his own, showing a course of consistent conduct negating that inference.<sup>8</sup> So in a case where the accused was charged of publishing a seditious libel in the form of an address to the electors of Westminster, Best, J., (afterwards Lord Wynford) directed the "jury to consider whether the address

J., told the jury in the case of John Reeves 26 St. Tr. 530 (592), "You must be convinced of, in order to find the defendant guilty, the quo animo with which this publication was made by the party." The necessity of intention was admitted in Amba Prasad, 20 A. 55 (69). F. B.; Bal Gangadhar Tilak, 22 B. 112; Ganesh Balwant, 12 Bom. L. R. 21; Jogendra Chandra Bose, 19 C. 35 (44). contained a sober address to the reason of mankind, or whether it was an appeal to their passions, calculated to incite them to acts of violence and outrage. If it was of the former description, it was not a libel, if of the latter, it was. That the question whether it was published with the intention alleged in the information, was for their consideration. That the intention was to be collected from the paper itself, unless explained by the mode of publication or other circumstances; and that if its contents were likely to excite sedition, etc., (as was alleged), the defendant must be presumed to intend that which his act was likely to produce."<sup>1</sup>

1202. As the section is worded, it may then be said that where the effect of a writing is to excite disaffection, intention to excite disaffection will be presumed, and it is then for the accused to shew that he never intended that the result should be as it has been. But in order to raise this presumption, the disaffection must be directly and necessarily traced to the sedition, for it may be post hoc, but it is not necessarily propter hoc. The question of intention is a question of fact, and is a material matter for the consideration of the jury,<sup>2</sup> who have to decide whether the effect produced was the result of the sedition, and where it has produced no effect, whether the nature of the sedition, was such as was likely to excite disaffection. Such intention cannot be inferred from isolated expression such as that the people of Bengal are trodden under the feet of strangers<sup>3</sup> or rasping criticism upon any measure of Government such as Lord Morley's Reforms,<sup>4</sup> or advising workmen, or the attainment of Swaraj unless it is used in a sense incompatible with the maintenance of British supremacy in India.<sup>5</sup> The fact that the Government has ordered the prosecution or that they had resolved that the writing was seditious ought not to weigh with the jury in the least. As Lord Kenyon remarked: "The accused is not to be crushed by the name of his prosecutor."<sup>6</sup>

1203. In considering the intention of the accused, and the effect his writings are likely to produce, it becomes necessary to take into consideration the state of the country and of the public mind at the date of the publication.<sup>7</sup> So the mere republication in Ireland, during a time of political excitement and threatened insurrection, extracts from American papers expressing sympathy with the Fenians and inciting all Irishmen to rebel, without one word of editorial comment or disapproval, was held to amount to sedition.<sup>8</sup> So again, while there is nothing illegal in advocating the boycott of foreign goods if it is intended to promote indigenous industries, it becomes seditious if the intention is to get rid of the English from India.<sup>9</sup> Such was held to be the intention of the accused, who at the time of intense communal tension ascribed the Hindu-Muhammadan riots in Calcutta to the policy of Government to divide and rule, and who, it was alleged, had in pursuance of such policy fomented them.<sup>10</sup>

1204. Not only the time but the place and people amongst whom the writing (2) Time and Place is circulated is material. A seditious libel against the King of England may pass unnoticed in Berlin. It may cause a riot in London. So, very little incitement is needed to produce an effect upon people already disaffected than upon those who are contented and loyal. So on a prosecution of the editor of a Marathi paper called Kesari for seditious writing Strachey, J., told the jury: "In considering what sort of effect these articles should be likely to produce, you must have regard to the particular class of persons among whom they were circulated, and to the time and other circumstances in which they were circulated. In judging what would be the natural and ordinary consequences of a publication like this, and what, therefore, was the probable intention of the writer or publisher, I must impress on you, as perhaps the most important point in my summing up, that you must bear in mind the time, the place, the circumstances, and the occasion of the publication. An article which, if published in England or among highly educated people, would produce no effect at all—such as an article on cow killing—might, if published among Hindus in India, produce the utmost possible excitement. An article which, if published at a time of profound peace, prosperity, and contentment, would excite no bad feeling might, at a time of agitation and unrest, excite intense hatred to the Government. When you are considering the probable effect of a publication upon people's minds, it is essential to consider who the people are. In my opinion, it would be idle and absurd to ask yourselves what would be the effect of these articles upon the minds of persons reading them in a London drawing-room or in the Yacht Club in Bombay; but what you have to consider is their effect not upon Englishmen, or Parsis, or even many cultivated and philosophic Hindus, but upon the readers of the Kesari among whom they are circulated and read—Hindus, Mahrattas, inhabitants of the Deccan and the Konkan. And you have to consider not only how such articles would ordinarily affect the class of persons who subscribed to the Kesari, but the state of things existing at the time.....when these articles were disseminated among them.”<sup>1</sup> And so he went on to say that “in the next place in judging of the intention of the accused, you must be guided not only by your estimate of the effect of the articles upon the minds of their readers, but also by your common sense, your knowledge of the world, your understanding of the meaning of the words, and your experience of the way in which a man writes when he is animated by a particular feeling.”<sup>2</sup>

1205. Moreover, in order to judge of the intention of the writer the real and not the literal sense of his writing must be considered.

(3) Form Immaterial.

As it was said in the same case: “A poem, an allegory, a drama, a philosophical or historical discussion, may be used for the purpose of exciting disaffection, just as much as direct attacks upon the Government. You have to look through the form, and look to the real object; you have to consider whether the form of a poem or discussion is genuine, or whether it has been adopted merely to disguise the real seditious intention of the writer.”<sup>3</sup> But for this purpose the text must be understood by the context. “You are not to take this paragraph in the indictment by itself, but from the whole as laid and as proved, you are to judge of the meaning and intention of the parties here.”<sup>4</sup> So also the learned Bombay Judge added: “In judging of the intention of the writer or publisher you must look at the articles as a whole, giving due weight to every part. It would not be fair to judge of the intention by isolated passages or casual expressions without reference to the context. You must consider each passage in connection with the others, and with the general drift of the whole.”<sup>5</sup>

1206. For instance, where an article imputed wholesale bribery to the ministerial officers of the Courts and to the lower officers of the Police force, and expressed grave doubts as to whether Government ever enquired into the truth of the grievances as it is occupied so much with investigations of boycott, dacoity and seditious matters etc., and it was published in a seditious atmosphere, it was held to amount to a sedition.<sup>6</sup> This only shows that in considering the question of sedition regard must be had to the time and place of its utterance the mental state of the populace and its effect upon them. A criticism however trenchant might fall short of sedition if it is addressed to a thinking populace. It would be sedition if it is addressed to an inflammatory people.

1207. And for this purpose it is necessary to see the nature and character of the writing, and the purpose for which it was written.

(4) Treatises and Reports Excepted. A political treatise, or an essay, would, for instance, be treated differently to a tract expressly written for circulation. "In a free country like ours," says Lord Kenyon, C. J., "the production of a political author should not be too hardly dealt with. The jury should recollect that they are dealing with a class of articles which, if written in a fair spirit and bona fide, might be productive of great public good, and were often necessary for public protection." They should therefore, "deal with them in a broad spirit, allowing a fair and wide margin, looking upon the whole not on isolated words."<sup>1</sup> So Strachey, J., said: "A journalist is not expected to write with the accuracy and precision of a lawyer or a man of science; he may do himself injustice by hasty expressions out of keeping with the general character and tendency of the articles. In this general character and tendency that you must judge the intention by looking at every passage so far as it throws light upon this."<sup>2</sup> So again, the fact that the accused was smarting under a grievance, or was honestly indignant at some act of a Government official, is material, as it tends to explain the language used and thus rebuts any presumption of seditious intention. For such a man cannot be expected to speak or write as calmly and deliberately as if he were discussing matters in which he felt no special interest.<sup>3</sup> For this purpose, it is permissible to the accused to give evidence of the circumstances which led up to the writing, and this was conceded in the Kesari case in which the learned Judge said: "You must gather the intention as best you can from the language of the articles; and you may also take into consideration, under certain conditions, the other articles that have been put in evidence."<sup>4</sup> Publication of a report of the proceedings of a Court of justice is not seditious even though the report may reproduce in extenso the seditious writing which is the subject-matter of the charge. But it does not justify republication of other articles which may have been filed but not used as evidence in the case.<sup>5</sup>

1208. Judging of Cause from Effect.—Where a seditious utterance is immediately followed up by tumult or insurrection, the jury may well consider it as the result of the sedition, though even in such a case the fact is not conclusive, for the accused may show that the rioters had a grievance of their own and would have revolted apart from his exhortations. A person who lights a match in a gunpowder magazine may be said to have set it ablaze, but it can scarcely be said that it was his intention. He may have been careless, but carelessness is a defect in character: it is not a crime. It has been held in the Punjab that the amendment of the section in 1898 has had the effect of rendering intention immaterial, if the accused does something defined in the first part of the section, which brings the Government into hatred and contempt.<sup>6</sup> But the words used are "brings into contempt," and no one can be said to bring another into hatred without intending to do so. Moreover, there is nothing in the section to set it free from the general exceptions to which the Code generally is subject, and which makes criminality depend upon the presence of criminal intention. Suppose a mad man was to indulge in a fiercely seditious lampoon on the Government; would it be said that insanity was in his case no defence?

1209. When is Disaffection Likely.—Similarly, the third question about the likelihood of the utterance causing disaffection, is a question of fact which the jury have to decide, having regard to the nature and character of the writing, the time and occasion for it, the people to whom it was addressed, and their susceptibilities (if any) pandered to. Indeed, all the facts before noticed as reflecting upon the speaker's intention are equally material in judging of the likely result of his words. For the facts which make a result probable are also the facts which weigh with the speaker in addressing his audience. But for them, his speaking will be a tinkling cymbal producing no conviction and no effect.

1210. In considering the likelihood of a certain result it is not irrelevant to consider the position and standing of the accused, and the natural influence his words are likely to convey to another. A person of no influence or character in a locality, may speak sedition, but his may be a cry in the wilderness for no one will pay any attention to them. If, however, the same words be spoken by another who is a popular favourite or to whom the people are otherwise bound by ties of religion or social intimacy, they may produce a very different effect. And as every speaker presumably knows the effect his words are likely to produce on his audience the fact is as material to establish his intention as it is in determining the effect his utterance is likely to produce. So Strachey, J., informed the jury: "Then you have to look at the standing and position of the prisoner Tilak. He is a man of influence and importance among the people; he would be in a position to know what effect such articles would probably produce in their minds."<sup>1</sup>

1212. "Brings or attempts to bring or excite."—It is not every utterance or writing tending to beget an ill opinion of Government that is to be held seditious. This was at one time the tendency in England where the doctrine was pushed to its utmost, often to ridiculous length. So it was said that "if persons should not be called to account for possessing the people with an ill opinion of the Government, no Government could exist ; for it is very necessary for the Governments that the people should have a good opinion of it."<sup>1</sup> And so Lord Ellenborough, C. J., told the jury in 1804 : " It is no new doctrine that if a publication be calculated to alienate the affections of the people by bringing the Government into disesteem whether the expedient be by ridicule or obloquy.....it is a crime,"<sup>2</sup> If these dicta be held to represent the modern view of the law, then it will be difficult to say what is not sedition. Moreover how are they then to be reconciled with the more recent judicial pronouncements on the subject : " The people have a right to discuss any grievances that they may have to complain of."<sup>3</sup> "A journalist may canvass and censure the acts of the Government and their public policy—and, indeed, it is his duty. It might be the province of the press to point out the weakness or imbecility of a Government when it was done for the public good."<sup>4</sup> Indeed, at one time the tendency of the Courts appears to have been to connect even the most trivial acts of obscenity with sedition, it being sagely argued that to destroy morality was to destroy the peace of a Government, since Government was no more than public order. So Sir Charles Sedley was indicted before the Court of the Star Chamber for exposing his naked body from a balcony in Covent Garden.<sup>5</sup> So a man, was executed for predicting the King's death.<sup>6</sup> And morality and politics in course of time became so entangled in English Law that even the modern statute relating to sedition has not been able to distinguish that offence from "blasphemous" writings.<sup>7</sup> English Law does not, therefore, represent a mine undefiled of sound precedents upon which an indiscriminate draught may be made for illustration of the rule here codified. At the same time with this necessary reservation, there is no reason why English precedents should not be used to illumine and illustrate a subject which owes its language and thought to them and which have served as a model to the Indian codifier.

1213. Thus the three words "hatred, contempt, and disaffection" are words of English Law. And in understanding their meaning regard must be had to the sense they bear in English Law. An offence under the Code is not complete unless the words spoken or written have been published, and either they constitute an attempt to bring into hatred the Government, or do bring it into hatred.

1214. What is an Attempt.—Now, what is the character and meaning of an attempt as used in this connexion? "An attempt," said Jenkins, C. J., "is an intentional, premeditated action, which if it fails in its object, fails through circumstances independent of the person who seeks its accomplishment. If its failure is to be attributed to something which he cannot control, its failure is no excuse."<sup>8</sup> Attempt is merely trying.<sup>9</sup> Both a person attempting and a person accomplishing have the same object, the same intention. They both make the same effort. And if one succeeds and the other does not, it may be the seed in the one case has been sown on uncongenial soil. In judging then of the culpability of an utterance what the jury has to find is whether it was ordinarily sufficient to produce the effect mentioned in the section.<sup>1</sup> If it was, it is immaterial that it did not have that effect. A certain amount of speculation must necessarily enter into such calculation. But the finding must be based upon reason and human probabilities and the general experiences of mankind. It must not be a mere conjecture based upon no intelligible data. Such data will be supplied by the language used, its true meaning and central thought, and the sense and impression they are likely to convey or produce upon those to whom they are addressed. Again, in considering this question regard must be had to the character, nature and susceptibilities of the people to whom the words are addressed, and by whom they were read. A realistic picture of a butcher slaughtering a cow will convey much more to a Hindu community than it will to a Mahomedan congregation. On the other hand, words conveying innuendoes and covert suggestion in the form of an allegory may convey nothing to a people not accustomed to that form of language. To an educated man versed in current politics the most harmless satire may appear as seditious. One is not unaccustomed to hear a long drawn sermon built on a few words of scriptural text. But this is a work of imagination which the jury have to keep under rein in judging the man in the dock. They have to decide not what the prisoner might have meant, but what he must, probably did, mean by his words. They have further to say whether the words used were with the intention of producing hatred or contempt against the Government. In determining whether the intention with which any document is published, is or is not seditious, the writer must be deemed to intend the consequence which would naturally flow from his work, taking into consideration the time and the circumstances of the case.<sup>2</sup> The jury have in effect to say to themselves: "We think the prisoner did use those words intending to cause popular hatred of the Government and we think they were enough to carry that intention home". The guilt of the prisoner is then complete, irrespective of the result produced.

1215. Such was held to be the case of Tilak who had given publicity to an imaginary conversation of Sivaji in which he deplored the ascendancy of the outcast foreigners, and depicted the golden era he had left. The utterance was published in the Marathi paper Kesari which had a wide circulation in the Deccan. It was published at a time when the popular mind was in a ferment on account of the plague preventive measures of the Government. Within a week of the publication of the articles, two Englishmen were shot dead in Poona, and while it was conceded that the prosecution could not produce evidence to show that these murders were directly caused by the publication of these articles, still the fact was mentioned by counsel, leaving the jury to form an opinion as to their being the probable effect of the articles. The jury convicted the prisoner by majority.<sup>3</sup> So in another case, the writer described a Darbar in Hell in which the Emperor wanted to choose as his successor some one possessing the qualities of cruelty and savagery in a pre-eminent degree and out of three candidates his choice was stated to have fallen on one who pressed forward his claims as a champion villain. He was described as wearing boots and a coat and a head-gear shaped like a masons's hod. He smoked from a wooden pipe and had a cane in one hand. Batty, J., charged the jury to say if the allegorical representation was not to ridicule British rule in India, and the jury answered in the affirmative.<sup>4</sup> These are cases in which sedition was couched in the form of a poem or an allegory.

1216. But sedition may be preached in a thousand ways, sometimes directly, sometimes indirectly, sometimes in the guise of a candid friend, sometimes out of sincere conviction. But in most of such cases, the question is a question of intention and construction. In one case the defendant was indicted for publishing what purported to be a resolution of persons calling themselves the "General Convention" containing the statement that "the people of Birmingham are the best judges of their own right to meet in the Bull-ring or elsewhere; and are the best judges of their own power and resources to obtain justice." The jury were told that the first sentence was not seditious and that the second would be if it meant to suggest that the people should make use of physical force as their own resource to obtain justice, and if it was intended to arouse the people to disorder and tumult. The jury acquitted the prisoner.<sup>1</sup> In another case the writer referred to a circular said to have been issued by Canada intending to throw off the English yoke and lamenting that India should have become so callous and shameless as not to feel the humiliation of being laughed at by all nations for losing such vast god-like country. It was held by the Full Bench that the language used was seditious.<sup>2</sup> In this case the writer had suggested the use of force for securing independence; but where the accused in a speech charged his audience to work for and secure Swaraj, his words were held not to be seditious, as Swaraj being self-government, there was nothing seditious in demanding it, as it was perfectly consistent with British rule.<sup>3</sup> To attribute "the sad state of the country to the influence of French gold on those who have the conduct of affairs" was held to be seditious libel.<sup>4</sup> The same view was taken of an announcement made for the relief of the widows and orphans of our beloved American fellow-subjects "who, faithful to the character of Englishmen preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only inhumanly murdered by the king's troops."<sup>5</sup> So were the words of a sermon: "Darkness has long cast her veil over the land. Persecution and tyranny have carried universal sway. Magisterial powers have long been a scourge to the liberties and rights of the people."<sup>6</sup>

1217. All these are cases where the words were unconnected with any resultant effect. Where, however, they actually produced the effect described in the section, the case is then comparatively easier. For it then remains only to connect the effect with the cause, though this by itself is not always an easy task. Indeed, as history teaches us, the creation of a political cataclysm is seldom the result of a single speech or writing, though it may have been prompted by it. But this is enough in law, which looks to anything producing an effect whether singly or joined with others as the cause of it. And it is indeed not even an essential element of legal causation that the effect in fact should be directly traced to that thing alone, for it is sufficient if its connection is so probable that a reasonable man would, under the circumstances, believe in its existence.<sup>7</sup>

1218. Hatred : Contempt : Disaffection.—Assuming now that a person speaks or writes words, which produce a certain effect upon the popular mind, the next requirement of the section is that by those words he must bring or attempt to bring His Majesty or the Government into hatred or contempt, or that he should thereby excite or attempt to excite disaffection. It is not every inflammatory speech or writing that is seditious. In order to be seditious, it must produce or attempt to produce those feelings against the Government. But feelings among whom, the section does not say. Such feeling may then be produced either among subjects, or among people who owe no allegiance to the King. Suppose, for instance, an Indian was to deliver a seditious lecture at Tokio; would he be liable to prosecution on his return home to India? It would appear that he would be so liable, for though he could not excite "disaffection" among his audience, he could certainly "bring into hatred or contempt" His Majesty or his Government, and it is enough for the offence. But what is "hatred or contempt" of Government? The two words do not mean the same thing, though they have certainly much in common. They are, however, easily distinguishable. Hatred implies an ill-will, while contempt implies a low opinion. One shuns an object hated, but an object of contempt may be the subject of pity. One may pity but wish well an object of contempt, but one usually wishes evil of one hated. Hatred and contempt are the state of mind in relation to an object. In the case of a person such as the King, such a feeling requires no explanation. But as a feeling against the Government it may not be quite obvious.

Now, looked at as a concept, Government is an abstraction. As such, it is as much inconceivable as an abstract horse or man. In the mind it is always associated with some person or persons in whom are centred for the time being the functions of Government. It is in this sense that the term has been defined for general purposes in the Code.<sup>1</sup> But it is not to be understood in this sense here. It is here used in its impersonal sense as meaning the existing political system as distinguished from any particular set of administrators.<sup>2</sup> "It means the person or persons collectively in succession who are authorised to administer Government for the time being."<sup>3</sup> Consequently, the hatred of such Government does not mean hatred of any of its composing members. Such hatred if expressed in words may amount to defamation, but it is not sedition. In this respect the English rule is identical. So where Langley said to the Mayor of Salisbury whilst in the execution of his office, "Mr. Mayor, I do not care for you; you are a rogue and a rascal," it was held that the words were not indictable, though the Mayor might and ought to have instantly bound him over to be of good behaviour.<sup>4</sup>

1219. The hatred and contempt here spoken of must then be hatred and contempt of the State, or of the established form of Government. But such hatred and contempt is possible even on expression of the privileged "disapprobation" of its measures or action within the meaning of the explanations.<sup>5</sup> Now since he may express the strongest condemnation of such measures, and he may do so "severely and even unreasonably, perversely and unfairly,"<sup>6</sup> it is conceivable that a criticism that heaps condemnation on a responsible minister of Government may not improbably reflect upon the Government for in common parlance the abstract notion is only reached by idealizing the concrete. How is then the critic to escape sedition while levelling his venomous darts against the acts and measures of Government? Suppose one were to say: "This Government is perfect, but it employs judges who murder law and ministers who murder men," and another were to say: "Down with this viper Government. Its judges are just and ministers considerate, but we must change the Government because it is foreign," which statement would be seditious or would only be merely an expression of one's disapprobation of the act of Government? That such a criticism would undoubtedly be treated as seditious seems to admit of no doubt.<sup>7</sup> What is then the difference? It is submitted, it is only one of degree. It may be added that the words "hatred and contempt" were only added to the section in 1898. They did not exist before.

Hatred of State,
Not of its Servant.

1220. Disaffection.—Next to hatred and contempt the section speaks of disaffection. This is an important word, and its exact meaning has to be understood. "The word disaffection," said Petheram, C. J., "implies a feeling contrary to affection. It includes disloyalty and all feelings of enmity"<sup>8</sup> towards the Government. The word "disaffection," be it noted, is a word invariably employed to denote disloyalty or discontent of servants or subjects in relation to their employer or political superior. An employer of labour may speak of his hands as disaffected, but in doing so he probably employs a figure of speech; for the words appear to be reserved to import political discontent, enmity or hatred,<sup>9</sup> proceeding from a spirit of opposition and resistance. The word "disaffection," moreover, implies discontentment of a body of men, and not only of a person or two. It implies that a section of the public are discontented with the existing system of Government, and would, if they could, attempt to subvert it. Disaffection is then disapprobation, but it is disapprobation intensified by hatred and a desire for opposing or retaliatory action. In this way though the two words are allied as genera and species, still in their connotations they are so far apart that for all practical purposes they could scarcely be confused for each other. Now as disaffection is the invariable precursor of rebellion, it is the concern of the State to see that there is no disaffection, and some States ensure it on the principle of lopping off tall poppies, whilst others take the more reasonable course of punishing sedition and reforming their constitution.

The charge in this case is marred by a lamentable mistake and misquotation, in consequence of which the Judge allowed himself to say that "Disaffection is the absence of affection," a statement of law which was twice repeated, but which the learned Judge afterwards withdrew. It was probably reminiscent of the scriptural text: "Those, who do not love me hate me."

1221. This section lays down the penalty that preachers of sedition have to suffer. Whether they excite disaffection or attempt to excite disaffection, they are in each case equally guilty. And their criminality does not cease even if failing to excite disaffection, their words only bring the Government into hatred or contempt. Indeed, the same speech or writing may produce different feelings in different minds. One may feel contempt, another hatred, and a third may feel disaffected by the same speech at the same time. And it is possible for the same person to feel hatred and contempt as well as disaffection in the senses these words have been used. It is not therefore necessary to say which feeling was engendered at a given time, nor is it possible. It is enough that a feeling of one kind or the other was produced or likely to be produced by the writing or speech complained of. But would it be enough if it is produced in one or two men and not among the public at large? As the section has been phrased, it is clear that what is intended is, that the matter to be seditious should have influenced or be likely to influence the public generally and not only particular members of it. It is only then that one can be said to have brought the Government into hatred or contempt. This, moreover, implies dissemination of one's thoughts with a view to bring about that result. For one may feel hatred and contempt of the Government, but it is not sedition: one may reduce one's thoughts to writing and so long as that writing remains unpublished there can be no offence, for it cannot influence the opinions of others.<sup>1</sup> The moment, however, that it is published, though not in the manner or to the extent contemplated by the author,<sup>2</sup> the offence is complete, for it may then arouse those feelings in others. So Batty, J., said: "With the feeling of hatred the law can do nothing, because it cannot see into the heart and cannot reform it, but law does step in when any attempt is made to excite the feelings in others."<sup>3</sup>

1222. It is consequently immaterial that the words used were not the speaker's own. The gravamen of the offence consists in their publication and not their authorship. As in defamation so in sedition, it is no defence to say that the accused had only copied or circulated matter which had already been published, or that it has been published upon the responsibility of one who was its author.<sup>4</sup> The only defence in such a case is inadvertence or want of knowledge or intention. Such knowledge will, however, be presumed in one who is the declared printer or publisher under the Press and Registration of Books Act,<sup>5</sup> for a declaration signed under section 5 of that Act to the effect that the "declarant" is a printer or publisher of the periodical therein specified carries with it the presumption and that whatever is published thereafter is published by the declarant in accordance with his declaration.<sup>6</sup> But this is merely a presumption which may be reverted, by shewing that the declared publisher or printer was ill or absent at a given time, and had therefore no knowledge of the publication,<sup>1</sup> and it is, moreover, submitted that the knowledge of the publication of periodical does not necessarily imply knowledge of its contents, much less knowledge that its contents are seditious.

1223. In order to fasten the presumption of such a knowledge, it would have to be held that the publisher is also the censor of a periodical and that he is at liberty to reject what he does not wish to print. But surely this is the function of the editor and not of the printer. In any case the term "printer" does not include compositors and the like, nor the term "publisher" include news-vendors and news-agents. But in England the authorities are undoubtedly in favour of the view that even a news-agent selling seditious libel may be indicted on the bare fact of publication. So John Almon was indicted for selling through his servant at his shop a newspaper called the London Museum, in which was published a letter of Junius to the King, and at the trial, a juror put to Lord Mansfield this question: "Whether selling in the shop by a servant of a pamphlet without the knowledge or privity, or concurrence of the master in the sale, or even without a knowledge of the contents of the libel or pamphlet so sold, be sufficient evidence to convict the master," to which Lord Mansfield replied: "I have always understood and take it to be clearly settled, that evidence of a public sale or public exposure to sale, in the shop by the servant or anybody in the house or shop, is sufficient evidence to convict the master of the house or shop, though there was no privity or concurrence in him unless he proves the contrary, or that there was some trick or collusion."<sup>2</sup> But before the jury returned their verdict the Judge qualified this statement by saying that instead of saying that it was sufficient evidence he should have said it was prima facie evidence to charge him, unless he could shew it was by trick or collusion, and without his knowledge or privity.<sup>3</sup> Almon was thereupon convicted and fined 10 marks though the real printers and publishers tried by another jury at Guildhall were acquitted. Almon moved for a new trial on the ground of the Judge's misdirection and then Lord Mansfield explained himself<sup>4</sup> by stating that what he had meant, to lay down was that publication of the print by the servant for the master was prima facie evidence of publication by the master himself, but that it was liable to be contradicted by contrary evidence tending to exculpate the master by shewing that he was not privy nor an assenting party to it. Then his Lordship added that thus stated, the point was as much established as that an eldest son is heir to his father. Aston, J., agreed and added: "He has the profits of the shop and is answerable for the consequences."<sup>5</sup>

1224. This case was decided in 1770 when the law of constructive treason was rampant, and the rule laid down by Lord Mansfield has been considerably modified in recent years. Baron Wood in a case sated that the publication must be "by one conscious of its contents."<sup>6</sup> Otherwise a postman or messenger carrying a sealed parcel enclosing a libel would be equally guilty.<sup>7</sup> even though he cannot read.<sup>8</sup> Lord Campbell's Act has somewhat altered the law in this respect<sup>9</sup> but it is submitted, not to the extent necessary. It lays down that whenever under the plea of not guilty "evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of any other person by his authority, it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care or caution on his part."<sup>10</sup> This section applies to all cases of criminal libel, blasphemous, seditious or otherwise.<sup>11</sup> So it has been now held that the directors of a printing company are not criminally liable for a libel contained in a paper printed by the servants of the Company, unless they knew of or saw the libel before its publication, or gave express instructions for its appearance.<sup>1</sup> It may be added that no criminal prosecution against any proprietor, publisher, editor or any person responsible for the publication of a newspaper can now be instituted for any libel published therein without the order of a Judge at Chambers being first had and obtained. Such application is to be made on notice to the person accused who shall have an opportunity of being heard against such application.<sup>2</sup> Even under the rule as so declared, the accused is not liable for sedition unless it was manifest and apparent, and this has been always the rule.<sup>3</sup> It may perhaps be added that even in this view of the law the practice of the Indian Courts<sup>4</sup> to sentence printers and publishers to long terms of imprisonment on the mere presumption of knowledge cannot be supported.

1225. No Sedition.—Lastly, the section exempts two classes of comments from the purview of sedition. In this respect the section has undergone some verbal changes, but they do not substantially affect the rule as previously enacted. It will be observed that second and third explanations do not necessarily exclude each other. Indeed, the third explanation is more general than the second explanation and sanctions comments generally without any view to obtaining a reform. But while second explanation speaks of the measures of the Government, third explanation speaks of the administrative or other action of the Government. It would seem that the second explanation deals with the criticism of a general policy, whilst the last explanation deals with particular acts not affecting its policy. The two explanations would then mean this, that it is not sedition to adversely criticise the acts and policy of the Government, so long as it is not calculated to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection against the Government. This much was conceded by Strachey, J., who said: “A man may criticise or comment upon any measure or act of the Government, whether legislative or executive, and freely express his opinion upon it. He may discuss the Income Tax Act, the Epidemic Diseases Act, or any military expedition, or the suppression of plague or famine, or the administration of justice. He may express the strongest condemnation of such measures, and he may do so severely, and even unreasonably, perversely, and unfairly. So long as he confines himself to that, he will be protected by the explanation. But if he goes beyond that, and, whether in the course of comments upon measures or not, holds up the Government itself to the hatred or contempt of his readers, as for instance, by attributing to it every sort of evil and misfortune suffered by the people, or dwelling adversely on its foreign origin, and character or imputing to it base motives, or accusing it of hostility or indifference to the welfare of the people, then he is guilty under the section, and the explanation will not save him.”<sup>5</sup> A journalist is not expected to write with the accuracy of a lawyer or a man of science; he may do himself injustice by hasty expression out of keeping with the general character and tendency of the articles.”<sup>6</sup> This is a very clear enunciation of the rule, and it lays down the utmost limit of fair criticism. So Lord Loughborough said in the debate upon Fox’s Libel Bill in 1792: “Every man may publish at his discretion his opinions concerning forms and systems of Government,—if they be wise and enlightening, the world will gain by them, if they be weak and absurd, they will be laughed at and forgotten if they be bona fide, they cannot be criminal, however, erroneous.”<sup>7</sup>

1226. Right of Criticism.—So, more recently Fitzgerald, J., summed up the right of the subject to criticise his Government as follows:—"When you come to consider what a journalist may do, I have to point out that a journalist may (and, indeed, it is his duty to), canvass and censure the acts of the Government of the State; he is free to discuss their acts and their public policy, and he may canvass, and if he thinks proper, censure the acts of Government and ministers, and above all, he is invited to consider what is of the greatest importance, the administration of the law. Justice demands that the errors of the Court of Justice shall be pointed out: and all that is within the province of a public journal. But this course should be carried out with calm and temperate language. The man who criticises the conduct of the Government, ought not to impute improper motives; and though he may point out that there is bad administration of justice, yet he should not use language that would indicate contempts of the laws of the land. When a public writer uses his privilege to create discontent and dissatisfaction, he becomes guilty of what the law calls sedition."<sup>1</sup> So in another case it was said: "It is the right of the British subject to exhibit the folly or imbecility of the members of the Government. But if in so doing, individual feelings are violated, there the line of interdiction begins, and the offence becomes the subject of penal visitation."<sup>2</sup> These extracts are sufficient to show that the view of the English Judges is in entire harmony with the exceptions, which do not encourage the creation of a servile press, but a press which possesses perfect freedom of speech so long as it does not deteriorate into a malignant abuse. And as regards the second explanation, it is not invariably necessary that the criticism of a Government measure should be accompanied by a suggestion for its alteration by lawful means. It may be a measure calling for censure, which may then be unreservedly passed thereon, but if its alteration is suggested, then it should be only by constitutional means. The comments may be relevant or irrelevant, wise or foolish, couched in a style of irony or satire, but the critic must not overstep the limit here prescribed. He must not take an individual act of the Government and moralize upon its total inadequacy. He must not fasten a political lampoon on a topic of passing interest.

1227. Punishment.—The punishment for sedition varies from transportation for life to a mere fine. The propriety of providing such severe maximum sentence was questioned at the time the original Bill was under discussion, and the force of the objection was conceded by the Law Commissioners who observed that the English Criminal Law Commissioners had in their digest fixed the term of imprisonment not exceeding three years.<sup>3</sup> A comparison of the sentences passed by the Indian Courts with those awarded to offenders convicted in England would seem to suggest a glaring disparity in the conception of the gravity of the offence in the two countries, at variance with the original intention of those who were responsible for the enactment of the Code, and who had condemned the sentence of transportation as an "unwarrantable severity" for the offence in question, proposing to limit it to five years, for which the sentence of simple imprisonment for three years was to be provided as an alternative.<sup>4</sup> As it is, the sentence admissible under this section may be transportation for life or for any period, imprisonment, or fine. The sentence of transportation for any term sanctioned by this section is a departure from the general law, and is only allowable, because it is so expressly authorized. It need scarcely be added that the object of the Crown in instituting prosecution of this nature is not vindictive,<sup>5</sup> and severe punishment would defeat its purpose by evoking public sympathy and arousing a greater hostility towards the Government. Such sentence is wholly unjustifiable if the accused is pressing for reforms without advocating violence,<sup>6</sup> or where the language used is not intemperate,<sup>7</sup> or where the usual mitigating circumstance, e.g., old age or peaceful character of the accused, is present.<sup>8</sup>

125. Whoever wages war against the Government of any Asiatic Power in alliance or at peace with the Queen or attempts to wage such war, or abets the waging of such war, shall be punished with transportation for life, to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.

Waging war against any Asiatic Power in alliance with the Queen.

1228. Analogous Law.—This section was clause 114 of the original Bill and was passed at the time when there was no provision for punishing such an offence, which, however, is now punishable under the more exhaustive provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870,<sup>1</sup> which extends “to all dominions of Her Majesty including adjacent territorial waters.”<sup>2</sup> That Act not only prohibits the waging of war against the dominions of any friendly State,<sup>3</sup> but it prohibits the rendering of any assistance to any person for war-like purposes. It was under section 119 of this Act that Dr. Jameson was prosecuted for his raid into the territories of the late Boer Republic.<sup>4</sup> It was, however, held in that case that in order to bring a case within section 11 there must have been a preparation in the Queen’s dominions, but “when you have got that fact established there may be an assistance in such preparation, or an employment of the kind mentioned in the section, outside the Queen’s dominions, which, will amount to an offence against the Act, if the person rendering such assistance or accepting such employment be a subject of Her Majesty.”<sup>5</sup>

1229. Procedure and Proof.—A prosecution under this section requires complaint made “by order of or under authority from the Governor-General in Council, the local Government or some officer empowered by the Governor-General in Council in this behalf.”<sup>6</sup> The offence is not cognizable but a warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused—
  - (a) Waged war, or
  - (b) Abetted the waging of war, or
  - (c) Attempted to wage war.
- (2) With a friendly Asiatic power;
- (3) That his prosecution was duly sanctioned by Government.

1230. Charge.—In framing the charge under this section the form given under section 121 should be followed, substituting for the “Emperor” the words “the Government of an Asiatic Power in alliance (or at peace) with the King.”

1231. Principle.—This rule is sanctioned by international comity, and a desire of the State to remain friendly with its neighbours.<sup>7</sup>

1232. War against an Asiatic Power.—This section has been drawn to protect friendly Asiatic powers from the ravages of British subjects who may make excursions into their territory, and then run back to the comparative security of their own homes. It is not necessary that the Asiatic power should be outside India. The native Feudatory States in India are such Asiatic powers, and an invasion of their territory, will expose a person to the penalty of the rule. So where the accused accompanied an illegal expedition into Manipur, a Native State, he was held to have committed the offence under this section.<sup>8</sup>

1233. Commercial Contracts Exempted.—Where two friendly States are at war with each other it is not the abetting of such war to embark upon a merely commercial enterprise, so long as it is not directly conducive to the waging of war.

In 1870 France and Germany were at war. England was neutral. France contracted with an English Cable Company for the laying of a submarine cable connecting two points from which communication between Dunkerque and Verdon could be easily made, and which would have assisted France in her war against Germany. The Company's ship "The Invincible," employed to lay the cable was arrested, and the question was whether she was employed in aiding the military operations against a friendly State. It was held that the primary object of the contract being to offer commercial facilities by improved communications, the contract was of a commercial character, and it did not assume any other character because the cable was also to subserve military operations.<sup>1</sup> But where a ship was engaged for the express purpose of towing a prize of war or its crew to a safe harbour, she was held to have contravened the Act and she might then be captured in neutral waters.<sup>2</sup>

1234. The friendly foreign State under this Act may be a State de facto, though not de jure exercising the functions or assuming to exercise the functions of Government. So where the insurgents during the Cuban rebellion had formed themselves into a Government, the Privy Council held that it was a foreign friendly State within the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act.<sup>3</sup>

126. Whoever commits depredation, or makes preparations to Committing depredation on territories of Powers at peace with the Queen. commit depredation, on the territories of any Power in alliance or at peace with the Queen, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine and to forfeiture of any property used or intended to be used in committing such depredation, or acquired by such depredation.

1235. Analogous Law.—This section deals with depredation as the last section deals with war. An illegal war is nothing more than a depredation. However, this section has a wider application than the last as it applies to a Power not necessarily Asiatic.

1236. Procedure.—An offence under this section requires sanction, and its procedure is in other respects the same as for an offence under the last section.

1237. Charge.—The charge under this section should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows.—

"That you——, on or about the——day of——at——committed (or made preparation to commit) depredation on the territories of——a power in alliance (or at peace) with the Emperor, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section (126) of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

1238. What is Depredation.—Depredation is briefly plunder.<sup>4</sup> It is pillaging by men or animals. A war illegally carried on is scarcely distinguishable from a depredation, except perhaps in the intention; the object of the predatory band being plunder. A depredation to be punishable under this section must be a raid by a band of men into foreign territory for the purpose of general robbery, plunder or laying waste. An outrage by an individual against the property of an individual is not depredation, but theft or robbery as the case may be. The section rather refers to an organized raid planned to plunder generally without reference to any individual.

127. Whoever receives any property knowing the same to have been Receiving property taken by war or depredation mentioned in sections 125 and 126. taken in commission of any of the offences mentioned in sections 125 and 126, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine and to forfeiture of the property so received.

(4) From L. de praedari, to plunder.

1239. Analogous Law.—This is the only section in this chapter under which no sanction is required for a prosecution.

1240. The receiver of property acquired in illegal war or depredation is in the nature of the receiver of stolen property, and the language of this section though narrow is not incomparable with that used to define that offence in section 411.

1241. Procedure and Proof.—An offence under this section requires no sanction. It is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. The points requiring proofs are :—

- (1) That the property was acquired in war or depredation.
- (2) That the war or depredation in which the property was acquired was punishable under section 125 or 126.
- (3) That the accused received such property.
- (4) That when he received it, he knew that the property had been acquired as mentioned in 1 and 2.

1242. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows :—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—received (specify the property), knowing the same to have been taken in waging war against—an Asiatic power in alliance (or at peace) with the Emperor (or knowing the same to have been taken in the commission of depredation) on the territories of—a power in alliance (or at peace) with the Emperor and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 127 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

1243. Principle.—A receiver of property obtained in war or depredation becomes an accessory after the fact, or an abettor in the large sense in which that term has been used in English Law, if he receives the property “ knowing the same to have been taken in the commission of the offences mentioned in sections 125 and 126.” He is consequently similarly punishable.

1244. Meaning of Words.—“ Receives any property : ” Retention of property for another is not receiving it within the meaning of this section. “ Knowing the same to have been taken : ” The word knowledge is as much stronger than “ believe,” as the latter is stronger than the word “ suspect.”<sup>1</sup>

1245. Receipt of Booty.—The receiver of the spoils of war or depredation is in the nature of a particeps criminis when he knows of the origin of the property received by him. Such a person must be distinct from the actual warrior or depredator, whether a British subject or a foreigner taking refuge with his plunder within British territory. He is not liable to be dealt with not as a receiver but as a principal offender. The receiver is a person who acquires property from him usually by purchase at a nominal price. Raiders generally drive cattle across the frontier where they get rid of them for what they will fetch. Such receivers are liable to be punished under this section, though the principal offenders may escape scot-free. The object even in such a case of punishing the receivers is to discourage depredation in foreign territory by making it difficult for the depredators to relieve themselves of their spoil.

1246. But honest receivers are exempted ; only those who knew that the property had been so acquired are liable to be punished. Such knowledge must be founded upon facts known to or brought to the notice of the receiver.

1247. Where such depredations are common, intending purchasers may well suspect that the property offered to them may have been so obtained. But it is not enough to bring them within the penal visitation of this section for which something more is required. The law requires knowledge that the property was acquired in war or depredation, but such knowledge will be presumed where the sale is made by persons who are transfrontier thieves and known to be so, and who habitually live by such depredations. The disposal of the property at a very low price, or the hurry or secrecy attending its sale, its unusual character and its unaccountable possession with the seller are other facts from which such knowledge may be inferred. The offence is analogous to one punishable under section 411 under which the salient features of such an offence will be found more exhaustively set out.

128. Whoever, being a public servant and having the custody of any State prisoner or prisoner of war, voluntarily allows such prisoner to escape from any place in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with transportation for life, or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Voluntarily—s. 39.]

1248. Analogous Law.—This section is only an aggravated form of an offence under s. 225-A which relates to a public servant intentionally aiding or suffering a prisoner to escape from his custody. The words used in the two sections are different, but the sense is the same.

1249. Procedure and Practice.—For the prosecution of an offence under this section a complaint of Government is necessary.<sup>1</sup> An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but warrant may be ordered in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Sessions.

- (1) Sanction ;
- (2) That the accused was a public servant ;
- (3) That he had the prisoner in custody ;
- (4) That the prisoner escaped ;
- (5) That the prisoner was a State prisoner, or a prisoner of war ;
- (6) That he allowed him to escape from his place of confinement ;
- (7) That he did so voluntarily.

1251. Charge.—The charge may be framed as follows :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:—

“ That you—being a public servant (mention the office), and as such having the custody of—a State prisoner (or a prisoner of war), on or about the—day of—at—, voluntarily allowed such prisoner to escape from—, the place in which such prisoner was confined, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 128 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

1252. Principle.—This and the next two sections deal with the rescue and escape of State prisoners. This section punishes a public servant who voluntarily allows a State prisoner to escape, while the next section deals with one who only negligently suffers one to escape. The last section in the chapter punishes any one rescuing or assisting in the escape of a State prisoner.

1253. Meaning of Words.—“ State prisoner ” is a prisoner confined under the provisions of the “ Regulation for the Confinement of State Prisoners,”<sup>2</sup> under the authority of the Governor-General in Council. Such a prisoner is arrested for “ reasons of State, embracing the due maintenance of the alliances formed by the British Government with foreign powers, the preservation of tranquillity in the territories of native princes entitled to its protection, and the security of the British dominion from foreign hostility and from internal commotion.”<sup>3</sup> Not only foreigners but British subjects, may be arrested under the provisions of these Regulations, and all who are so arrested will be State prisoners,<sup>1</sup> and they may be detained in any fortress, jail, etc.,<sup>2</sup> "Prisoner of war" is an enemy taken in arms who is according to the laws of civilized war to be treated as prisoner till the termination of hostilities, and not slain. A prisoner of war is a State prisoner.<sup>3</sup>

129. Whoever, being a public servant and having the custody of any State prisoner or prisoner of war, negligently suffers such prisoner to escape from any place of confinement in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Public servant—s. 21.

State prisoner or prisoner of war—s. 128.]

1254. Analogous Law.—This section is the same as the last only with the mitigating circumstances that the escape was not allowed voluntarily but was suffered negligently.

1255. Procedure and Practice.—A prosecution under this section requires the complaint of Government.<sup>4</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by the Court of Sessions, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

1256. Proof.—The points calling for proof are the same as under the last section, only instead of proving that the accused allowed the prisoner to escape voluntarily, it is sufficient under this section to prove that the escape was due to the accused's negligence. For, though he may not be a consenting party to his escape and would have opposed it if he had known, still the prisoner's escape may be due to his negligence. A sentry falling asleep while on duty would be guilty under this section,<sup>5</sup> while one opening the jail gate to let out the prisoner will be guilty under the last.

1257. Charge.—The charge under this section should be similar to one under the last section, only substituting the words "negligently suffering" for "voluntarily allowed."

130. Whoever knowingly aids or assists any State prisoner or prisoner of war in escaping from lawful custody, or rescues or attempts to rescue any such prisoner, or harbours or conceals any such prisoner who has escaped from lawful custody, or offers or attempts to offer any resistance to the recapture of such prisoner, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A State prisoner or prisoner of war, who is permitted to be at large on his parole within certain limits in British India, is said to escape from lawful custody if he goes beyond the limits within which he is allowed to be at large.

1258. Analogous Law.—The last two sections refer to public servants. This applies to all alike. In its general wording, it includes the two offences under the preceding sections, and while these latter only refer to escape from the prisoners place of confinement, this deals with escape, however, and from wheresoever effected. In one respect this section is narrower than the last, in that it requires that the rescue or assistance should be made or given "knowingly", the purpose of which is evident for while a public servant having the custody of his prisoner knows that his prisoner is a State prisoner or a prisoner of war, such knowledge cannot be presumed on the part of the public at large. It is, therefore, necessary to prove in his case that he had such knowledge at the time he assisted him in his escape or rescue. This section is a special adaptation of the more general sections 223-225B of the Code.

1259. Procedure and Practice.—A prosecution under this section requires the complaint of Government. An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

1260. Charge.—The charge under this section should run thus:—

“ That you——on or about the ——day of——at——knowingly aided (or assisted or rescued, or attempted to rescue or knowingly harboured or concealed)——a State prisoner (or prisoner of war) in escaping from lawful custody (or who had escaped from lawful custody or offered or attempted to offer resistance to his recapture after he had escaped from lawful custody) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 130 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

1261. Meaning of Words.—“ Knowingly aids or assists ” : The knowledge must be that the person assisted is an escaped State prisoner or a prisoner of war. The word “ aid ” implies indirect assistance as for example by supplying food or drink ; assistance means direct help in the escape. “ Harbours or conceals ” : To harbour a person is to give him shelter and protection. “ To the recapture, ” which presumably means legal recapture. A prisoner of war cannot be legally recaptured after he has escaped from the territories of the State. “ Permitted to be at large on parole, ” i.e., is given limited liberty to move about within a defined area on his verbal promise that he shall not escape.

CHAPTER VII. OF OFFENCES RELATING TO THE ARMY, [NAVY AND AIR FORCE.]<sup>1</sup>

1262. Topical Introduction.—"A few words will explain the necessity of having some provisions of the nature of those which are contained in this chapter. It is obvious that a person who, not being himself subject to military law, exhorts or assists those who are subject to military law to commit gross breaches of discipline, is a proper subject of punishment. But the general law respecting the abetting of offences will not reach such a person; nor framed as it is, would it be desirable that it should reach him. It would not reach him, because the military delinquency which he has abetted is not punishable by this Code, and therefore is not, in our legal nomenclature, an offence. Nor is it desirable that the punishment of a person not military, who has abetted a breach of military discipline, should be fixed according to the principles on which we have proceeded in framing the law of abetment. We have provided that the punishment of the abettor of an offence shall be equal or proportional to the punishment of the person who commits that offence; and this seems to us a sound principle when applied only to the punishments provided by this Code. But the military penal law is, and must necessarily be, far more severe than that under which the body of the people live. The severity of the military penal law can be justified only by reasons drawn from the peculiar habits and duties of soldiers and from the peculiar relation in which they stand to the Government. The extension of such severity to persons not members of the military profession appears to us altogether unwarrantable. If a person, not military, who abets a breach of military discipline, should be made liable to a punishment regulated according to our general rules, by the punishment to which such a breach of discipline renders a soldier liable, the whole symmetry of the penal law would be destroyed. He who should induce a soldier to disobey any order of a commanding officer would be liable to be punished more severely than a dacoit, a professional thug, an incendiary, a ravisher, or a kidnapper. We have attempted in this chapter to provide, in a manner more consistent with the general character of the Code, for the punishment of persons who not being military, abet military crimes."<sup>2</sup>

1263. Analogous Law.—Similar provisions have been enacted under the English Army Act<sup>10</sup> and the Indian Army Act,<sup>11</sup> which, however, relate exclusively to military men who are punishable by Court-Martial. In England civilians who endeavour to seduce any person serving in Her Majesty's forces by sea or land from allegiance to Her Majesty, or to incite any such person to commit any traitorous practice whatsoever, are on conviction by a Civil Court, liable to penal servitude for life.<sup>12</sup> The section provides for India what these provisions do for England.

(12) 37 Geo. III, c. 70, amended by 7 Wm. IV and I Vict., c. 91; similar provision to punish a person on board is made under the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act (Act XXXIV of 1934).

1264. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. A prosecution under this section alone does not require sanction, though sanction would be, of course, necessary if it is intended also to prosecute under section 124-A.

1265. Proof.—The points to be proved to establish the offence are :

- (1) That the person abetted was an officer, soldier or sailor in the King's Army, or Navy.
- (2) That the accused abetted him to commit mutiny, or attempted to seduce him from his allegiance or his duty.

1266. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—abetted the commission of mutiny by—, an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Emperor [or attempted to seduce—an officer (or soldier or sailor or Airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Emperor from his allegiance (or his duty)] and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 131 of the Indian Penal Code.

1267. Principle.—As stated in the Topical Introduction (§1262), this chapter supplements the provisions of the Army Act and extends to civilians its penal provisions regarding abetment of military offences. All are intended to prevent the tampering of the army by extraneous pressure, assistance or influence. And so far as the section is concerned it is enacted to punish the abetment of mutiny and sedition by a military man. The offence contemplated is an abetment of the offence whether such abetment is or is not successful,—only, if successful, the abettor is then liable to the enhanced penalty provided in the next section. This section then relates only to an abetment not followed up by actual mutiny, or which—supposing actual mutiny follows—is not in consequence of that abetment.

1268. Meaning of Words.—“ Abets the committing of mutiny ” : “ Abets ” as defined in s. 107 and “ mutiny ” as explained elsewhere. (§ 1269) “ Or attempts to seduce such officer ”: This is exactly the language of section 7 (2) of the English Army Act applicable to India.<sup>1</sup> The seduction of a soldier from “ his allegiance or his duty ” has been there interpreted to mean only an act amounting to treason, such as sedition.<sup>2</sup> It does not extend to mere insubordination or disobedience how-muchsoever flagrant.<sup>3</sup> An act may fail to amount to abetment, but it may still be “ an attempt to seduce,” as where Pindi Das published an article in a vernacular weekly newspaper called “ India ” headed “ The British Government's Native forces, Bande Mataram,” which purported to be a letter from a sympathiser of native soldiers, in which the accused compared the lot of the native sepoy, to that of the British soldier, and of which he posted some 3000 copies to the sepoys, it was held that the accused was guilty both under section 124-A as well as under this section.<sup>4</sup>

1269. Abetting Mutiny.—The term “ mutiny ” has not been defined in the Code. It, however, implies collective insubordination, or a combination of two or more persons to resist or to induce others to resist lawful military authority. A man cannot be charged generally with mutiny, or with an act of mutiny, but only with some one or more of the specific crimes laid down in section 7 of the Army Act above summarized. If he has not brought himself within the terms of that section, his offence, however much it may tend towards mutiny, must be

(1) (1881) 44 & 45 Vict, c. 58.

(2) The language here applied has also been used in a similar English enactment; 7 Geo. III, c. 70, as amended by 7 Will IV and I Vict., 91.

(3) Pindi Das, (1907) P. W. R. (Cr.) 37.

(4) Pindi Das, (1907) P. W. R. (Cr.) 37.

dealt with as insubordination under section 10 hereafter quoted (§ 1308). Thus, where there is an actual mutiny or a conspiracy to mutiny, all concerned in the mutiny or conspiracy may be tried under section 7 for causing or conspiring to cause, or joining in the mutiny as the case may be. If no mutiny or conspiracy exists, a man can only be tried under section 7 on a charge of endeavouring to persuade some person in Her Majesty's forces or in the Navy to join mutiny, or of failing to inform his commanding officer of an intended mutiny. These remarks apply equally whether the person accused is "subject to military law," and therefore charged under the Army Act, or whether he is a civilian and therefore charged under this section. Since the insertion of section 138-A<sup>1</sup> in 1887, a sailor in the Navy of the Queen includes also a sailor in the Indian Marine service,<sup>2</sup> which is regulated by the Indian Marine Service Act.<sup>3</sup> The Explanation is new, and was added by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act, 1870.<sup>4</sup>

1270. Persons subject to the Articles of War for the better government of Her Majesty's Army are non-combatants attached to and serving with the army, such as camp-followers and others who are classed as "soldiers" for the purpose of this section.

1271. Obviously, this section has no application to a friendly advice tendered by one person to another concerning his own individual betterment, as where a relation or friend advises a sepoy to give up soldiering for trade, or to secure his discharge. The section only applies to incitement, leading the soldier to mutiny en masse, or to the breach of his allegiance or his duty. Such a case may arise where one counsels the soldiers not to fire on a mob when commanded to do so, and which it is then his duty to do, for his is not to reason why, unless the order given be illegal. So where soldiers or sailors go on a strike, they and their abettors are both liable, the latter under this section, the former under the Military law.

132. Whoever abets the committing of mutiny by an officer, soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>5</sup> in the Army, [Navy or Air Force]<sup>6</sup> of the Queen shall, if mutiny be committed in consequence of that abetment, be punished with death or with transportation for life, or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Abetment of mutiny if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof.

1273. Procedure and Proof.—The offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

1274. The points requiring proof are the same as under the last section, except that it must be further proved that the mutiny was committed in consequence of the abetment. The same fact should be specified in the charge which should otherwise follow the wording of the form set out under the last section. (§ 1266).

133. Whoever abets an assault by an officer, soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>7</sup> in the Army, [Navy or Air Force]<sup>8</sup> of the Queen on any superior officer being in the execution of his office, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Abetment of assault by a soldier, sailor or airman on his superior officer when in execution of his office.

(8) See footnote 7.

1275. Analogous Law.—The substantive offence, the abetment of which is made here punishable, is that defined in section 8 of the Army Act.<sup>1</sup> The terms of that section are, however, wider, for it comprises not only striking or use of any violence to his superior officer being in the execution of his office but also assault and the use “of threatening or insubordinate language” to him when he is not on duty.

1276. Now this section does not apply to the abetment of assault by a soldier or an officer not being in the execution of his office; and since the mere use of threatening or insubordinate language does not constitute an assault within the meaning of the Code, it follows that the criminal responsibility of the abettor under this section is not co-extensive with that of the soldier.

1278. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

1279. Proof.—The points calling for proof under this section are :—

- (1) That the accused abetted an assault by another who was then a soldier in the army or sailor in the navy or airman in the air force;
- (2) That the assault was abetted on his superior officer who was then in the execution of his duty.

1280. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—abetted an assault by—an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Emperor on—a superior officer being in the execution of his office and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 133 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

1281. Meaning of Words.—“By an officer, etc.,” who must be subject to Military law, i.e., who must be then on the active list, or be a reservist. An officer or soldier who has been discharged or retired on pension is not then liable under section 8 of the Army Act, and this section providing an enhanced penalty will not apply to an abetment of an assault by him. The word “soldier” in this section has the same meaning as in the explanation to s. 131<sup>2</sup> “On any superior officer”: For the meaning of this term see before (§ 1277). “Being in the execution of his office”: For the meaning of these words see below (§ 1283).

1282. Abetment of Assault by Soldier.—This section provides an enhanced penalty for abetting an assault by a soldier on his superior officer in the discharge of his office. A soldier is himself liable for not only an assault but also the use of threatening or insubordinate language,<sup>3</sup> and indeed for even disobedience of the lawful commands of his superior officer,<sup>4</sup> whether or not the superior officer be in the execution of his office, but the liability of an abettor is not co-extensive with that of the soldier, for, indeed, he is not under the same discipline, and the principle governing his criminal responsibility must, therefore, be necessarily different. According to the section he is only liable for (i) abetting an assault by an officer or soldier, on (ii) his superior officer, (iii) being in the execution of his duty. He is not liable for abetting, say, the use of threatening or insubordinate language except as provided in section 138, that is to say, if the use of the language is followed by an act of insubordination. The "assault" here contemplated is undoubtedly the same as is implied in the use of the phrase "strikes or offers any violence" in the English Statute. These words would include any defiant gesture or act, which, if completed, would result in actual violence, but do not extend to an insulting or impertinent gesture or act, from which violence could not result. For example, a soldier throwing down his arms or his accoutrements on parade, or throwing away his cap or belt in an impertinent manner, but in such a direction that they could not strike a superior could not be deemed to offer violence within the meaning of the term. So also a man shaking his fist, or even drawing a bayonet, or otherwise making a show of violence against a superior behind the bars of a cell, or at such a distance that striking him was at the moment impossible, is not guilty of an offer of violence. On the other hand, throwing a missile, or pointing a loaded fire-arm at a superior would come within it.

1283. Again, there can be no abetment of an assault where the assault itself was not an offence. Such would be the case if the violence be used in self-defence, or if it be shown that it was necessary, or that at the moment the soldier had reason to believe that it was necessary for his actual protection from injury, and that he used no more violence than was necessary for his purpose.<sup>1</sup> The abetment here made punishable is the abetment of an assault on a superior officer in the well defined sense in the Military Law.

1284. It will be presumably for the prosecution to show, that the abettor knew that the person assaulted was the assailant's superior officer at the time. This knowledge would be presumed where he was wearing his uniform and he held a rank superior to that of the assailant. But where he was a superior by virtue of his duty or temporary office, this knowledge cannot be presumed. Lastly, the assault must be on a superior "being in the execution of his office." It is difficult to define precisely the meaning of these words. The question whether the superior officer was or was not at the time in the execution of his duty depends upon the nature of his duties and the command of his own superior officer. So far as an outside abettor is concerned he may show that he did not know that the superior officer was then on duty. But a military officer may be presumed to be on duty, if he is in uniform, and if not he may be presumed not to be on duty, and in that case it will be necessary to prove some knowledge on the part of the abettor that he was on duty. Indeed, where the person assaulted was then in plain clothes, it must be shown not only that the abettor knew him to be on duty, but also that he knew him to be the assailant's superior officer. Of course a superior may be on duty not only when he is performing his prescribed duty, but also when he is discharging a duty arising out of the exigency of the moment. Such duty would be discharged where an officer finds a private drunk or disorderly or out of quarters after hours, or otherwise transgressing a rule of law, service or decorum, calling for his interference. An officer is generally responsible for the behaviour of his men, and his duties in relation to them are therefore as multifarious as they are varied. So far as the abettor is concerned, his responsibility does not rest upon that uncertain ground. So far as he is concerned, it lies on the prosecution to show not only that the officer was on duty, but that the abettor knew of it at the time. The aggravated character of his crime depends upon his knowledge without which neither the soldier nor the abettor is liable to the drastic penalties of disciplinary law.

1285. It may be added that this section only prescribes a punishment for assault abetted, but not committed. An assault so committed calls for the punishment prescribed by the next section.

(1) Ss. 96-106.

134. Whoever abets an assault by an officer, soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>1</sup> in the Army, [Navy or Air Force]<sup>2</sup> of the Queen, on any superior officer being in the execution of his office shall, if such assault be committed in consequence of that abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

1286. Analogous Law.—This section bears the same relation to the last as section 132 bore to its predecessor. The last section prescribes a punishment only for an assault abetted, but not committed. This section prescribes a penalty for an assault committed “in consequence of that abetment,”—a phrase, the meaning of which has been sufficiently explained elsewhere.<sup>3</sup>

1287. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

1288. Proof and Charge.—The points to be proved are the same as under the last section, with the additional fact that the assault was committed in consequence of the abetment. The charge should follow the form given under the last section adding, “and which he committed in consequence of the abetment” “after being in the execution of his office.”

135. Whoever abets the desertion of any officer, soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>4</sup> in the Army, [Navy or Air Force]<sup>5</sup> of the Queen, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Soldier—s. 131, Expl.]

1289. Analogous Law.—This and the next section refer to offences which are also offences under the Army Act,<sup>6</sup> and the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act.<sup>7</sup> This section extends to a sailor in the Navy, and to an airman in the Air Force, the same provisions as the Army Act provides for soldiers in the Army.

1290. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, and warrant may issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That the person abetted was an officer, soldier, sailor, or airman ;
- (2) That the accused knew it ;
- (3) That he abetted him to desert.

1292. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of the Magistrate etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“That you——on or about the——day of——, at——abetted the desertion of——, an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Empire, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 135 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

1293. Principle.—It is not necessary under this section that the desertion abetted should take place. It will suffice for the offence if it is abetted. As such, the abetment is both a military as well as a general offence when dealt with as a military offence, only a Court having a summary jurisdiction would appear to possess the power of trying the accused, but the procedure on his trial need not be necessarily summary, for it is provided in the Army Act that the trial in India shall be in such Courts and in such manner as may be from time to time provided therein by law.<sup>1</sup>

1294. Abetment of Desertion.—The only question arising in a case under this section is whether the accused had abetted desertion which raises the question what is desertion? Literally, desertion implies the forsaking or abandonment of duty.<sup>2</sup> But a person may abandon his duty by absenting himself without leave, but it is not desertion. In Military law the term is only applied when the soldier absenting himself without leave has no intention to return to his duty. It may be, that he did not intend to quit the service altogether, but if he had evaded the performance of some service of importance, his unaccountable absence will count as desertion.

1295. To establish desertion it is necessary to prove some circumstance justifying the inference that the prisoner intended not to return to military duty in any corps, or intended to avoid some important particular service, such as active service, embarkation for foreign service, or service in aid of the civil power.

1296. To establish an attempt to desert, some act which, if completed, would constitute desertion as above-mentioned, must be proved. It has been held in a case that a person may abet desertion of a soldier who is no soldier at all.<sup>3</sup> The view is, of course, erroneous in view of explanation to s. 131, and the meaning of abetment.

1297. Intention Distinguished from Attempt.—A mere intention to desert does not amount to an attempt to desert. As desertion depends upon the intention of the soldier, knowledge of that intention must be brought home to the abettor. For a person cannot be held guilty of abetment of desertion, unless it is shown that he knew that the act he was abetting was an offence, and that offence was desertion. If then the soldier leaving in consequence of the abetment had then the intention of returning to his regiment, his offence will be only absenting himself without leave,<sup>4</sup> which is only a minor delinquency as compared to desertion. But all desertion implies absence without leave with the intention superadded that the absentee does not intend to return to his duty. Such intention may be presumed on the part of one who is found leaving the country in plain clothes, or in disguise. A person may desert even though his absence was in the first instance legal, as where a soldier is allowed furlough, during or after which he deserts, but the criterion in each case is the same, namely, the intention of not returning. Now, as a soldier on furlough is still under orders, if he quits the place where he has permission to go, without asking leave, or if he disguises or conceals himself so that orders cannot reach him or if he goes on board a ship about to sail for a distant port, he is liable to be tried and convicted of desertion, though on furlough at the time. Intention to desert cannot be inferred merely from prolonged absence without leave, for a soldier who has been entrapped into bad company through drink, or other causes, may be absent some time without any thought of becoming a deserter. On the other hand, there may be circumstances, when desertion is apparent, as where a soldier is arrested on steamer sailing for America, though in such a case he might have been absent only a few hours.

136. Whoever except as hereinafter excepted, knowing or having reason to believe that an officer, soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>5</sup> in the Army, [Navy or Air Force]<sup>6</sup> of the Queen has deserted, harbours such officer, [soldier, sailor or airman]<sup>7</sup> shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is given by a wife to her husband.

1298. Analogous Law.—This section is also met by the provision of the Army Act<sup>1</sup> or of the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act.<sup>2</sup> Harboursing a deserter must be in the words of English Law concealing such deserter, or aiding or assisting him in concealing himself, or aiding or assisting in his rescue," knowing him to be a deserter. A person harbouring a deserter is in the language of English Law an accessory after the fact. The Code punishes not only one who harbours a deserter but other offenders as well.<sup>3</sup> But the essential ingredients of the offence are in each case the same, namely, concealment of the person to prevent his apprehension.

1299. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That the accused harboured the person in question,
- (2) Who was an officer, soldier, sailor or airman in the King's Army or Navy or Air Force;
- (3) That he had deserted;
- (4) That the accused knew or had reason to believe at the time that he was a deserter;
- (5) That the accused is not the wife of the deserter.

1301. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

"That you—on or about the—day of—at—knowing or having reason to believe that—an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Emperor had deserted, harboured such officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 136 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

1302. Harboursing Deserter.—The gist of an offence under this section lies in the fact that the deserter obtaining the help of another to conceal himself eludes the search and his apprehension. The case excepted is that of the wife, and for obvious reasons. In any other case, it will suffice to show that the accused had harboured the deserter, "knowing or having reason to believe" that he was a deserter. Such knowledge or belief must depend upon the circumstances of each case, but if the accused had known the deserter to be in the Army and he afterwards finds him in plain clothes, he cannot but believe that he must have deserted unless he has procured his discharge. So if a person appears in disguise, or solicits shelter and privacy, the accused may well believe that he is a deserter. But in order to convict the accused of harbouring it will not be sufficient to show that there was something in the deserter's dress or demeanour from which the accused might have suspected him to be a deserter. The section requires that he must at least have reason to believe that he was a deserter, and such reason must be shown and proved by the prosecution, and it must be sufficient to carry conviction to any reasonable mind that with that reason before him the accused must have felt convinced that the person he was harbouring was a deserter. Then again there must be evidence to show that the accused did harbour the deserter. The term "harbour" has been defined in the Code<sup>4</sup> but that definition is limited to the use of that term in sections 212, 216, and 216-A. In other sections the word is evidently used in the narrower sense explained in the English Statute (§ 1289). The harbouring here must then be shown to have satisfied that meaning.

137. The master or person in charge of a merchant vessel on board of which any deserter from the Army, [Navy or Air Force]<sup>1</sup> of the Queen is concealed, shall, though ignorant of such concealment, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred rupees, if he might have known of such concealment but for some neglect of his duty as such master or person in charge, or but for some want of discipline on board of the vessel.

1303. Analogous Law.—This section punishes the master of a merchant-man for criminal negligence in harbouring a deserter without knowledge. The facility which such vessels afford to deserters calls for the penalty here prescribed.

1304. Procedure and Proof.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, and summons may issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by the Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

1305. Two things are required to be proved against the accused : (i) neglect of duty, or want of discipline, (ii) that, but for it, the presence of the deserter would have been detected. If more is proved, the accused may be convicted under the last section.

1306. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ That—, a deserter from the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Emperor, had concealed himself on or about the—day of—at—on board—a merchant vessel of which you—are the master (or person in charge) through your neglect of duty as such master (or person in charge, or through your want of discipline on board the said vessel) and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under section 137 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1307. Liability of Ship's Master.—This section does not deal with the men of war. It only deals with merchant-vessels, or ships engaged in commerce. It is the duty of all masters of such ships to search the vessels thoroughly for stoways before disembarkation. A master, who does not order such search, or which, if ordered, is not made with the necessary diligence, is guilty of an offence under this section. But if the search was duly made, but the deserter could not be found the master is not criminally responsible, nor is he responsible if the deserter had taken his passage in disguise which the master was unable to see through.

138. Whoever abets what he knows to be an act of insubordination by an officer, soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>2</sup> in the Army [Navy or Air Force]<sup>3</sup> of the Queen, shall, if such act of insubordination be committed in consequence of that abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

1308. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes a punishment for abetment of insubordination by a soldier or sailor or airman.

1308-A. “ Insubordination ” in Military law may consist of any wilful breach of discipline or disobedience of lawful command. The term has been thus defined in the Army Act <sup>4</sup> :—

Insubordination. “ 10. Every person subject to Military law who commits any of the following offences, that is to say—

“(1) Being concerned in any quarrel, affray, or disorder, refuses to obey any officer (though of inferior rank), who orders him into arrest, or strives or uses or offers violence to any such officer, or

“(2) Strives or uses or offers violence to any person, whether subject to Military law or not, in whose custody he is placed, and whether he is or is not his superior officer, or

(2) Added by the Repealing & Amending Act, 1927 (X of 1927).
(4) Army Act, 1881, s. 10.

“(3) Resists an escort whose duty it is to apprehend him or leave him in charge, or “(4) Being a soldier breaks out of barracks, camp, or quarters,
 “shall on conviction by Court-martial be liable, if an officer, to be cashiered, or to suffer such less punishment as in this Act mentioned, and if a soldier, to suffer imprisonment or such less punishment as in this Act mentioned.”

1309. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That the act was one of insubordination;
- (2) That it was committed by an officer, etc., as mentioned in the section;
- (3) That the accused abetted the act;
- (4) That it was committed in consequence of the abetment;
- (5) That the accused then knew that the act was one of insubordination.

1311. Charge.—The charge may run thus:—

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—abetted what you knew to be an act of insubordination by—an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Emperor, and such act of insubordination was committed in consequence of the said abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 138 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1312. Abetment of Insubordination.—It is the first essential ingredient of an offence under this section that the accused should have known that the act he was abetting was an act of insubordination. Such knowledge implies knowledge of the act as well as its quality. If, for instance, an inferior officer orders the arrest of a superior officer prima facie it will not be insubordination if the former disobeyed the latter, and it will be no offence if a by-stander counselled him to resist. But if the latter knew that the superior had been concerned in a quarrel affray or disorder then as the order of the inferior is legal, so is its disobedience by the superior and its abetment by the by-stander equally illegal.

138-A (Application of foregoing sections to the Indian Marine Service)

1313. Analogous Law.—This section, which is merely explanatory of the term “Navy of the Queen” as used in the preceding sections, was added by the Indian Marine Act, 1884.<sup>2</sup> It ran thus:

Application of foregoing sections to the Indian Marine Service.

S. 138-A. The foregoing sections of this chapter shall apply as if Her Majesty's Indian Marine Service were comprised in the Navy of the Queen.

1313-A. The Indian Marine is not necessarily a part of the Navy of the Queen, because it is regulated by the English Statute not applicable to India. This section consequently has been repealed by Repealing and Amending Act of 1934.<sup>3</sup>

139. No person subject to [the Army Act, the Indian Army Act, 1911, Persons subject to the Naval Discipline Act, (or that Act as modified by articles of war. the Indian Navy Discipline Act, 1934),<sup>4</sup> or the Air Force Act],<sup>5</sup> is subject to punishment under this Code for any of the offences defined in this chapter.

1314. Analogous Law.—This section is also explanatory, and provides against persons subject to Military law being dealt with under this chapter. This is because, being subject to Military law, they can be punished under it. This is in accordance with the rule speciali generalibus derogant—which has been considered elsewhere (§ 79).

140. Whoever, not being a soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>1</sup> in the Military, [Naval, or Air]<sup>2</sup> service of the Queen, wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or any token used by such a soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>3</sup> with the intention that it may be believed that he is such a soldier, [sailor or airman]<sup>4</sup> shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

1315. Analogous Law.—This section applied first only to the personation of a soldier, but since its amendment in 1927, it applies equally to the personation of a sailor or airman.

1316. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, but summons may issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by any Magistrate and may be tried summarily.

1317. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused wore the garb, or carried the token in question ;
- (2) That such garb or token resembled that used by soldiers ;
- (3) That the accused was not a soldier ;
- (4) That he wore the garb or carried the token with the intention of passing off as a soldier.

1318. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), thereby charge you (name of accused), as follows :—

“ That you—not being a soldier in the Military service of the Emperor on or about the—day of—, at—wore—(specify the garb) or carried—, a token resembling (specify it) (or used by such soldier) with the intention that it might be believed that you were such a soldier, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 140 of the Indian Penal Code.

1319. Wearing a Soldier's Garb.—This section punishes what is a false personation of a soldier. His garb and token being his distinctive uniform by which he is readily distinguishable from all others, a person who wears them with the intention of passing himself off as such a soldier is guilty of an offence under this section. But he may be guilty of much more. If, for instance, he had donned that garb to act as a spy, in which case he subjects himself to the military law, and may be shot.<sup>5</sup> This section, however, deals only with the wearing of the garb, and the tokens of a soldier. The garb means his uniform, and the tokens would include such things as buttons, stripes, badges or medals, and the like. Merely wearing the soldier's garb is not a crime, for it is a daily spectacle in the cantonments where sweepers, bearers, and cooks may be seen masquerading in soldier's cast-off coats. So an actor upon the stage wears the varying costumes of military men. The crux of the offence is the intention to deceive, and such intention may be inferred from the nature of the disguise, and the purpose for which it was used.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE PUBLIC TRANQUILLITY.

1320. Topical Introduction.—This Chapter consisting of 21 sections deals with a class of offences intermediate between offences against the State, and those against the persons. Its general underlying object may be gathered from its heading which is to preserve public tranquillity.<sup>1</sup> The arrangement of the sections here as elsewhere in the Code, is again haphazard and unscientific. But such offences in their most elementary form consist of an affray.<sup>2</sup> Where, however, there is a meeting of great numbers of people with such circumstances of terror as cannot but endanger the public peace, the assembly is designated an unlawful assembly.<sup>3</sup>

1321. Sections 142-145, 150, 151, 157, 158 deal with the liability of persons who are members of an unlawful assembly. The use of force converts an unlawful assembly into a riot. In English Law there is a distinction made between a riot and a rout, a rout being a disturbance of the peace by persons assembled together, with an intention to do a thing which, if executed, would make them rioters, and actually making a motion towards the execution thereof, but not executing it.<sup>4</sup> The Code recognizes no such distinction, and the facts constituting a rout in England fall within the definition of a riot under the Code. A new section<sup>5</sup> was added to this chapter in 1898, and its object is to prevent internecine, racial or sectarian quarrels resulting in the disturbance of public peace. It is, however, more akin to the offence of sedition as defined by Sir James Stephen,<sup>6</sup> and its proper place would appear to be after s. 124-A.

141. An assembly of five or more persons is designated an “unlawful assembly” if the common object of the persons composing that assembly is—Unlawful assembly.

First.—To overawe by criminal force, or show of criminal force, the Legislative or Executive Government of India, or the Government of any Presidency or any Lieutenant Governor, or any public servant in the exercise of the lawful power of such public servant; or

Second.—To resist the execution of any law, or of any legal process ; or

Third.—To commit any mischief or criminal trespass, or other offence ; or

Fourth.—By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force to any person to take or obtain possession of any property, or to deprive any person of the enjoyment of a right of way, or of the use of water or other incorporeal right of which he is in possession or enjoyment or to enforce any right or supposed right ; or

Fifth.—By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to compel any person to do what he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do what he is legally entitled to do.

1323. Analogous Law.—This section defines an “unlawful assembly” by declaring an assemblage of more than five persons for any purpose indicated in the section, illegal. In fixing the number at five the section departs from the rule of English Common Law, under which an assemblage of only three persons for the purpose specified in the section is sufficient to constitute an unlawful assembly. In other respects the section generally accords with the English rule.

1324. The procedure for breaking up unlawful assemblies is laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure, Chapter IX (ss. 127-132) to which reference may be made.

1325. Principle.—It is a principle well recognized that law should discourage the tumultuous assemblage of men. In early times, therefore, the mere assemblage of men was regarded as a menace to peace and therefore unlawful. But with the growth of democratic power the assemblage of men became a public necessity though law still continues to look askance at the concourse of men but it could not punish men assembled for a lawful purpose, and therefore, it had to lay down that though an assemblage of men, however large, is not per se illegal, it may become illegal, if more than five persons meet for an unlawful purpose. The illegality was thus transferred from the assembly to the object of the assembly, and these are enumerated in the five clauses which form a part of the section.

1327. Essentials of “Unlawful Assembly.”—The first and the foremost essential element of an unlawful assembly is that it should consist of at least five persons, who should meet for a common object.<sup>2</sup> The five persons so meeting may not all have had the same object before meeting, some may be won over to the common cause by persuasion and influence, but so long as there are not five men to say “we agree to execute our common purpose” there is not an unlawful assembly. So in England where the number fixed is three, it has been held that two persons only cannot be guilty of a riot.<sup>3</sup> But where six persons being indicted for a riot, two of them died before trial and two were acquitted, the remaining two being found guilty, the Court refused to arrest judgment holding that as the jury had found two persons to be guilty of a riot, it must have been together with those two who had died without a trial.<sup>4</sup> Such, of course, is the law here, for though there must be five persons possessed of the same intention, it is not necessary that they should be all jointly brought to trial, for some of them may abscond and evade justice, but that would not affect the liability of those remaining.

1328. The section speaks of the five persons having a common object. Now the word “object” means the purpose, intention or design, and the clause requires that it must be “common,” that is, it must be possessed by all. But there may be five persons possessing a common wish, and they meet together, but that alone does not make their assemblage unlawful. For they may meet together in a theatre, and their object then may be to amuse themselves. In such a case they meet, but do not “assemble” within the meaning of the clause. That word implies the meeting of persons animated by the same purpose with the intention of furthering it. It is the combination of men for a common purpose that law discourages, for it regards such combinations as conducive to rioting and disorder. But the mere combination or assemblage of five men does not render their meeting unlawful, unless the meeting was in pursuance of a common unlawful object;<sup>1</sup> but such object need not be present in the minds of all before they meet, for it may occur to them afterwards<sup>2</sup> but as soon as five persons concur, the assembly becomes from that moment unlawful whatever may have been its character before.<sup>3</sup> Indeed, members of an assembly may have a community of object only up to a certain point beyond which they may differ in their objects, and the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object will vary, not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object.<sup>4</sup>

1329. Sometimes an assembly may be perfectly lawful in its inception, but it may become suddenly unlawful without previous concert among its members.<sup>5</sup> But it must be part of the plan of the meeting that the common object should be forthwith carried into effect: for if men meet only to arrange plans for future action, it cannot be said that there was any fear of the breach of the peace without which there can be no unlawful assembly.<sup>6</sup> Moreover, the objects illegal which the members have in common must be one of those specified in the section. If the object does not fall under either of those clauses it is not illegal and if the object is not illegal there can be no "unlawful assembly," whatever may have been the number of men meeting or the fear of disorder and tumult.<sup>7</sup> So, where five persons assemble for the purpose of gambling, their assembling does not constitute an "unlawful assembly" because gambling, though illegal, is not one of the illegal objects enumerated in the section.<sup>8</sup>

1330. This section does not declare the mere assemblage of men, however large, illegal. It requires that, in order to be illegal, it must be inspired by an illegal object as specified in the section, which must be proved by the prosecution. So, where there was a large concourse of men armed with sticks and bill-hooks, it could not be presumed that their object was illegal, though the fact that they were in a large crowd and were armed may raise some suspicion, but such suspicion is not proof upon which the accused could be convicted.<sup>9</sup> As the specification of the illegal common object is the essential ingredient of an offence under this section, it cannot be varied in appeal, for the trial proceeds upon proof of the common object which is specified, and not upon any common object which the facts of the case may disclose.<sup>10</sup> Where two opposite factions commit a riot, it is irregular to treat both parties as constituting one lawful assembly, and to try them together, in as much as they do not have "one common object" within the meaning of this section.<sup>11</sup>

1331. An assembly lawful in itself does not become unlawful merely by reason of its lawful acts.<sup>12</sup> It is not unlawful to carry sticks and if it provokes an assault the assailants are guilty and not those who use their sticks in self-defence.<sup>13</sup>

1332. The section declares the following five objects as illegal, which may now be examined.

1333. Overawing Government.—The first illegal object stated is the overawing of Government or a public servant by the show of criminal force. The terms there employed are the same, meaning of which will be best understood by referring to the commentary on s. 124-A (§§ 1196-1208). Here, however, the same subject may be again briefly recapitulated. The gist of an offence under this clause consists in (i) overawing, (ii) by the show of criminal force, (iii) the Government, or (iv) a public servant in the lawful discharge of his duty. A person is said to overawe another when he restrains him by awe, fear or superior influence. Overawing merely by superior influence is not criminal, nor is overawing by fear illegal unless it is attended by show of criminal force. But where a person is terrified into doing what he had otherwise no mind to do, and refraining from doing what he had otherwise a mind to do, he is said to be overawed, and where that fear is brought on by the show of force, he is said to be overawed by show of criminal force.

1334. It will be seen that overawing by show of criminal force of the Government is by itself illegal, but in the case of a public servant the use of criminal force is only illegal if it was used to obstruct him in the exercise of his lawful power. This is perfectly in keeping with the other provisions of the Code.<sup>1</sup> While, therefore, this clause confers an absolute protection on the Government, the protection conferred on its public servants is only qualified and circumscribed by the legality of their action (§ 871).

1335. Resistance to Legal Process.—Similarly it is illegal for five or more men to join in resisting “the execution of any law, or of any legal process.” The execution of any law means the carrying out of the provisions of law or the enforcement of any act warranted by law. The arrest of one or the attachment of one’s property is in pursuance of the execution of law authorizing such arrest or attachment. The measures adopted under the Epidemic Diseases Act, for the prevention of plague, would, for instance, be in execution of the law, namely, the Epidemic Diseases Act.<sup>2</sup> Process means a measure, and a “legal process” would similarly mean a measure in accordance with law. A notification issued in accordance with s. 30 of the Police Act prohibiting processions without license is one such process.<sup>3</sup> In either case the act or process must necessarily be legal, and the illegality of resistance would thus be judged by its legality.

1336. Commission of any Offence.—This clause is not free from avoidable ambiguity. It says that an assembly is unlawful, if its common object is “to commit any mischief or criminal trespass, or other offence.” Now, strictly speaking, the other offences must be ejusdem generis; otherwise the preceding enumeration was unnecessary. But the clause is intended to include all offences both against person and property, and not only mischief, criminal trespass and ejusdem generis. Where in a partition case a kutcheri house was allotted to one party but a formal deed of exchange had remained to be executed it was held that the mob who invaded and destroyed the house were guilty of mischief and therefore of rioting under this clause.<sup>4</sup> So where the mob had looted a crop which was their common object, but there was nothing to fix individual responsibility for the theft, a conviction for rioting was held to be appropriate.<sup>5</sup> moveable or immoveable, corporeal or incorporeal, (ii) to enforce any right, and (iii) to enforce any supposed right. The first clause relating to possession and dispossession is particularly ambiguous, if it is taken in conjunction with the second clause. For was it intended to enact that a person having a perfect right to property is under no circumstance entitled to vindicate that right by the use of force? If so, the clause is in sharp conflict with the general principles of English Law, and the right of private defence as described in the Code (§ 936.) Suppose, for example, that a person is surrounded by dacoits who rob him of his property. He has undoubtedly the right of defending himself against his assailants and for this purpose, he may enlist the co-operation of others. Suppose now five persons so assist him in beating off the dacoits; are they not entitled to use criminal force to take (i.e., recover) possession of their property? To deny them that right would be absurd and yet this is what the clause leads up to. Then, again, suppose that a person is entitled to a land, and has been in undisputed possession of it. If another commits a trespass, has he no right of turning out the trespasser and to use force for that purpose?

1337. Forcible Possession and Dispossession.—Similar ambiguity pervades the language used in this clause, which by the way, was not a part of the original Bill. As it stands, it would seem to prevent the use of force for (i) taking or obtaining possession of any property

1338. Curiously the Indian cases decided on the subject do not appreciate the difficulty presented by the literal reading of this section. They have been commented on before (§§ 855-863), and it is perhaps not necessary to advert to them once more. It will suffice here to state that it is undoubtedly the right of every person to use force within the limits prescribed by law, in defence of his or another's person and property. If, therefore, the use of such force is justifiable under one section, it cannot be held unjustifiable under this or any other section. And the fact that such an act may cause the breach of peace, is no reason for denying him his right, for to hold otherwise would, to use the words of Field, J., "amount to this, that a man may be convicted for doing a lawful act if he knows that his doing it may cause another to do an unlawful act."<sup>1</sup> This observation was made in the case of the Salvation Army, who, in defiance of the Police order to desist from marching out in a procession led a procession in the exercise of their right of way, though they knew that they would be attacked by a counter organization, of "The Skeleton Army" formed to oppose them. The Salvation Army were prosecuted for rioting but were acquitted on the ground that they were exercising their legal right of way.<sup>2</sup> This view was followed in India in a case where the accused had carried their idol in a procession.<sup>3</sup>

1339. Now if this view is right, the view taken in some of the Indian cases must be necessarily erroneous, unless, of course, there is anything to shew that the Indian Code had deliberately laid down a rule at variance with itself and the English Law. Indeed, in a case of the Punjab Chief Court, the difference in view was held to be due to the difference between the two systems<sup>4</sup> but that alone would not reconcile the Code with itself. However, whichever view may be right the conflict of views on so important a subject is regrettable. For, as before noticed, the Courts in this country are not agreed as to the legality of the use of force to vindicate one's right or possession of property. There are cases in which such a right is admitted.<sup>5</sup> On the other hand there are those in which it is unequivocally denied.<sup>6</sup> There are again cases in which the use of force is held justifiable only for the purpose of maintaining a right or possession, though not enforcing a right or obtaining or even regaining possession.<sup>1</sup>

1340. But these cases do not exhaust all the contingencies arising under the clause. For a person may have a right to a thing as well as possession, or merely one without the other which another person may claim or possess. What are then the rights of the two against each other, and how far is one entitled to enforce them against the other by application of force. Suppose, for instance, A has both the right to as well as possession of his land, which is threatened by B. Is A entitled to protect himself against the aggression of B by the use of force? If so, what force? In the exercise of his right of private defence he may employ force, but under this section he may not employ more than five persons for that purpose; but if he is at all entitled to use force, surely its adequacy must be determined by the nature of emergency and not by any rule of law. The solution of the question must, therefore, depend not upon the reconciliation of the rules, not upon any adventitious grounds, but upon the true principle dictating their enactment. And the questions that call the two rules into play are of daily occurrence and may arise under varying circumstances and conditions. For instance :—

(1) A may have both the right to as well as possession of his land, but B may threaten A's possession of it.<sup>2</sup>

(2) A may have only the right and B the possession, and A may like to recover possession from B, or conversely.<sup>3</sup>

(3) A may be in peaceful possession of land of which the title is in B, and A may resist B's forcible entry upon land in his possession.<sup>4</sup>

(4) A's peaceful but wrongful possession may be of a short duration in which case B may use force to eject A,<sup>5</sup> unless A had acquiesced in the latter's possession.<sup>6</sup>

(5) A and B may both be entitled to join possession.<sup>7</sup>

(6) In the last case A or B may, however, be in separate peaceful possession.

(7) A and B may be both jointly entitled to the land.

(8) There is a bona fide claim of right on both sides.<sup>8</sup>

1341. In short, the question is how far is a man justified in resorting to force for defensive purposes both for the purpose of retaining what he has got, and recovering what he has a right to. It would seem that the decided cases recognize the legality of the use of force in the former case;<sup>9</sup> but this can only be because this section offers no impediment to the exercise of that right, but if so, one fails to see why a different rule should prevail in the latter case, though the Courts undoubtedly emphasize the difference<sup>10</sup> (§§ 935-941). There are however cases, where this divergence of view cannot influence the decision. No person can have a right to prevent by force another person dealing with his own land merely because he may have some right of easement or customary right over a portion of that land, of which right

he is not at the time in actual enjoyment. It is not unlawful for the owner to defend his right to deal with his land.<sup>1</sup> The accused were playing music in celebration of their festival. A gentleman feeling annoyed by the noise seized their drum whereupon they assaulted him. It was held that the assailants, though guilty under s. 352, could not be convicted of this offence.<sup>2</sup> A person is entitled to defend not only his private and personal rights, but also his public right, e.g., his right of way. For instance, where the Municipality had leased out the right to collect tolls from persons exposing goods for sale on the road way, persons who obstructed such an attempt could not be denounced as forming an unlawful assembly.<sup>3</sup> An assembly lawful in itself does not become unlawful merely by reason of its lawful acts provoking others to do unlawful acts or by reason of their repelling an attack made by such persons upon them.<sup>4</sup>

1342. Bona Fide Claim Protected.—Not only a right but a bona fide claim is protected by reason of s. 79. Where two rival Zemindars were at law, and the Magistrate acting under s. 146 of the Criminal Procedure Code attached the disputed property and placed it in the management of a Receiver but omitted to give him any direction regarding its management. There was a dispute regarding the tenants, grazing rights thereon. The accused, who were tenants of one of contesting Zemindar obtained a lease of grazing rights. As such they objected to the tenants of the rival Zemindar ploughing up the land over which they claimed to have obtained a lease from the Receiver. It was held that their bona fides protected them.<sup>5</sup>

1343. Illegal Command to Disperse.—An assembly lawful in its inception does not become unlawful by the mere fact of its refusal to disperse in obedience to a command. To render it unlawful, the command to disperse must be lawful, that is to say it must not be a command given to a lawful assembly but to one which was or had become unlawful,<sup>6</sup> which it does not become merely because its presence is likely to provoke a breach of the peace.<sup>7</sup>

1345. It is of course, an elementary principle of criminal law that all the essential ingredients of an offence must be affirmatively proved by the prosecution, and that the measure of proof is not, as in a civil case, the balance of the evidence.<sup>10</sup> In some cases, e.g., the case of rioting, trespass, and offences against property generally there might be some difficulty in attaining this standard of proof, but it is no reason for adopting any other standard. For instance, where the land upon which a riot was alleged to have taken place, was found to lie fallow on the day of occurrence, it was held that regard being had to the condition of land and the nature of the acts of possession on which the parties relied, the question of possession may have to be decided on the further question of title.<sup>11</sup> The accused attempted to rescue stolen cattle from the possession of the complainant and the Police who accompanied him, and in rescuing, caused grievous hurt to them. It appeared that the Police had not only recovered the stolen cattle but also seized some herds to which they had no right. They also carried off the herdsman who tended the cattle. The accused caused grievous hurt to the Police and some of the complainant's men and one of them (B) was severely injured by an accused who was his enemy. It was held that though the accused were technically guilty of dacoity, the proper course was to convict the two assailants of the Police under s. 332 and the rest of rioting but that all the accused could not be constructively held liable for the specific act of B.<sup>1</sup>

1347. Illegal Compulsion.—This clause is generally indeed, too generally worded. All it means, however, is that no one can use criminal force to illegally compel another to do or forbear from doing any act connected or unconnected with property. It is not sufficient to bring a case under this clause that the accused should have merely used criminal force or show of criminal force to take possession of property, unless the use of force was accompanied by some criminal intent. So where a number of men turned out to remove the pipes laid by the District Board Sircar to replace a bridge, on the ground that they would obstruct the flow of water, it was held that the object of the accused was not unlawful within the meaning of this clause.<sup>7</sup>

142. Whoever, being aware of facts which render any assembly an unlawful assembly, intentionally joins that assembly, or continues in it, is said to be a member of an unlawful assembly.

Being member of unlawful assembly.

1348. Principle.—The last section defines an "unlawful assembly." This section defines who is a member of such an assembly. All persons present at a meeting are not members, nor for that purpose is it necessary that all present should assent to its purpose. If a person attends a meeting innocently but he continues therein after he is made aware of its illegal purpose, he is so far as his legal responsibility is concerned, in the same predicament as if he had attended the meeting with previous knowledge and approval of its object. Such knowledge may be communicated to him at any time in any manner, directly or indirectly. If he is once apprised of it, it is then his duty to withdraw, failing which his presence will be construed as of one who had willingly joined the assembly with the purpose of furthering its common object.<sup>1</sup> This rule is however made subject to the exception that his joining or continuance in the assembly should have been "intentionally." This excludes a case of one inveigled into an assembly by deception or misrepresentation. It is not, of course, necessary that a person should be aware of all the proceedings or purposes of the assembly. It is enough if he continued in it after being made aware of only so much as was sufficient to make it unlawful.

143. Whoever is a member of an unlawful assembly shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.<sup>2</sup>

Punishment.

1349. Analogous Law.—This section constitutes being member of an unlawful assembly an offence. It is not, therefore, necessary that the purpose of the unlawful assembly should have been achieved or that even an attempt should have been made in that direction. Law suppresses unlawful assemblies because, if not suppressed, they lead to more serious crimes.

1350. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, but summons may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by any Magistrate and may be tried summarily. But in order that the accused may be so tried the offence must be strictly one under this section, and not one of graver kind, as for instance, rioting. Where therefore on the facts disclosed by the evidence the offence committed was one of rioting, but the Magistrate convicted them summarily under this section, it was held that the offence should not have been mitigated merely for the purpose of introducing a different jurisdiction, or a lower scale of punishment or of applying the summary mode of procedure and that if the accused so desired, they were entitled to a re-trial on the more serious charge.<sup>3</sup> This offence does not involve the use of force, so that a conviction under this section does not justify an order for security under section 106 of the Procedure Code.<sup>4</sup>

- (1) That there was an assemblage of at least five persons ; (§ 1327).
- (2) That the object of the meeting was any of the five objects mentioned in s. 141;
- (3) That the accused shared that object with at least four others of the meeting ;
- (4) That the accused intentionally joined the meeting—
  - (a) having knowledge of its object, or
  - (b) continued therein after having had that knowledge.

1352. It lies on the prosecution to prove all the ingredients constituting the offence<sup>5</sup> which cannot be done merely by the opinion of witnesses, since the offence can only be proved by such facts as the cries of the rioters and the like.<sup>6</sup>

1353. Charge.—The charge should specify the unlawful common object of the assembly.<sup>7</sup> Where it is criminal trespass and it is compoundable, the members would still be liable to punishment under this section.<sup>8</sup> The charge may run thus :—

"I (name and office of (Magistrate, etc.)), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:—

"That you—on or about the—day of—at—were a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was (here specify the object) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 143 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1354. Principle.—This section read with the last makes it penal to intentionally join an assembly, the object of which is illegal, or to continue, therein after the illegality of its object is known. The mere participation in a meeting is, therefore, not punishable under this section unless it is accompanied by knowledge and intention at least evidencing acquiescence in its object.

1355. Member of an Unlawful Assembly.—A person cannot be punished under this section, unless the prosecution are able to establish that (i) there was an assembly of five or more persons; (ii) that it was "unlawful" within the meaning ascribed to that term in section 141; (iii) that the accused was a member of that assembly; and (iv) that he was aware of its unlawfulness. The fact that there was an assemblage of men does not render the assembly unlawful within the meaning of section 141. It may by its number portend a breach of peace, but even that fact does not render an assembly illegal, though in that case it may justify an executive action, for the Code of Criminal Procedure empowers all Magistrates and officers in charge of police-stations to command the dispersal of not only unlawful assemblies but also of "any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace."<sup>1</sup> Even in such a case the assembly does not become unlawful merely because it continues without dispersing in defiance of the lawful order to disperse, for there is no clause under section 141 to say that an assembly refusing to disperse in obedience to a lawful command becomes an unlawful assembly. But it is conceivable that such an assembly may easily contravene the conditions of its legality, as if it overawes the public servants charged with the duty of dispersing it; or it may otherwise bring itself within the terms of section 141. In this connection, however, it may be stated that no one has the power to disperse an assembly on the ground that it was likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, unless there were facts sufficient to satisfy the Court that the assembly was likely to cause such disturbance. A mere opinion of the Magistrate who ordered the particular assembly to disperse is not sufficient.<sup>2</sup> It is needless to add that no person can be convicted, as they were in the Punjab, for passing close to the village of their enemies.<sup>3</sup>

144. Whoever, being armed with any deadly weapon, or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, is a member of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.<sup>4</sup>

Joining unlawful assembly, armed with deadly weapon.

1356. Analogous Law.—This section is an aggravated form of the last section, the aggravation consisting in the carrying of lethal arms which is itself a menace to peace, and which shows preparation and an intention to use force, and which has further the effect of overawing those against whom it is directed. The punishment in such cases, therefore, varies with the amount and nature of the danger threatened. The term "deadly weapon" does not occur in the original draft, in which the corresponding words used were "weapon for shooting, stabbing, or cutting." The term is now more general and would include not only those weapons but others having a deadly effect.

1357. Procedure.—An offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by any Magistrate. A person armed with a deadly weapon may be tried jointly with those not so armed, if they both were members of an unlawful assembly, though they may be separately charged with and convicted under this or the last section, as the case may be. When one person instigates another to join an unlawful assembly armed with a deadly weapon and afterwards joins the unlawful assembly himself, he may be punished under this section read with section 114, even though he was not himself armed with a deadly weapon.<sup>1</sup>

1358. Proof.—The points to be proved are the same as under the last section (§ 1351) in addition to which it must be proved that the accused was armed with deadly weapon, or with anything which used as a weapon of offence is likely to cause death.

1359. Charge.—The charge may run thus:—

“ That you— on or about the—day of—at—, being armed with a deadly weapon, to wit—(or armed with—which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death) were a member of an unlawful assembly, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 144 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1360. Principle.—The gravity of an offence depends upon the gravity of consequences threatened or possible. A number of men armed with deadly or dangerous weapons are obviously a menace to public peace, and as they are capable of greater mischief so must be the punishment comparatively more deterrent.

1362. Armed with Deadly Weapon.—The only distinguishing feature of an offence under this section is that a member of an unlawful assembly is armed with a deadly weapon. As such, he is liable to an enhanced punishment under this section, but only a person armed with a deadly weapon would be so punishable, others being punished under the last section.

1363. In order to render a person liable to the enhanced penalty provided by this section, it must be shown that besides being a member of an unlawful assembly he was armed with a “ deadly weapon.” The section does not define this term, but it obviously describes it by its effect, “ anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death.” The question whether a particular instrument is or is not lethal then depends upon whether it is or is not likely to cause death. It may not be designed as a weapon of offence, but if when so used it is likely to cause death, it is a deadly weapon whatever may have been its nature and character. A hatchet or a crowbar<sup>2</sup> would thus be a deadly weapon, for when used as weapons of offence, they are likely to cause death.

1365. The section speaks of "whoever being armed" and which would seem to suggest that only persons actually so armed are liable to the enhanced penalty here prescribed. But it has been held that this is by no means necessary and a person may be convicted under this section, though he was not himself armed with a deadly weapon. Such a case has been held to arise when one person instigates another to join an unlawful assembly armed with a deadly weapon, and afterwards joins that assembly himself, in which case he may be punished under this section, read with section 114 of the Code, though he was not himself armed with a deadly weapon.<sup>3</sup> But this view has been controverted by another Bench of the same Court who held that the "whoever" could not mean any person other than the person actually armed with a deadly weapon. In their view no one can be subjected to the aggravated penalty provided by this section 148, on the ground of being constructively armed with a deadly weapon.<sup>4</sup>

145. Whoever joins or continues in an unlawful assembly, knowing that such unlawful assembly has been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

1366. Analogous Law.—This section is closely allied to section 151 and these two sections must be read with section 127 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. That section refers to the dispersal of an assembly of more than five persons if it is unlawful, or is likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace. This section prescribes the penalty applicable to the former as section 151 prescribes a similar penalty applicable to the latter. As however the penalty for refusing to disperse an assembly likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace is less than that prescribed in this section, and as such an assembly may as well as be unlawful, the explanation appended to section 151 provides that such a case should be dealt with under this section. The provisions of both the sections are generally similar to the provisions of section 188 which is enacted to meet a general case of disobedience to an order duly promulgated by a public servant.

1367. Procedure and Proof.—An offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and may be tried by any Magistrate.

1368. In order to establish a charge under this section all the four points necessary to establish a case under section 143 must be proved, in addition to which the following additional points must be further established:—

- (5) That such unlawful assembly had been commanded to disperse.
- (6) That such command to disperse was in the manner prescribed by law.
- (7) The accused joined or continued in such unlawful assembly after it had been commanded to disperse.<sup>5</sup> A mere refusal to obey an order is not sufficient, since joining at consequence implies an overt act.<sup>6</sup>
- (8) That he did so, knowing that it had been commanded to disperse.

1369. It is found that at the time of the order of dispersal the assembly did not consist of five persons but less, the Court may still proceed to deal with disobedience under section 188.<sup>7</sup>

1370. Charge.—The charge may run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:—
"That you—on or about the—day of—at—, joined (or continued in) an unlawful assembly, knowing that such assembly had been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 145 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1371. Though the common object must be placed in the charge, its omission to do so does not vitiate a conviction if there was sufficient evidence on record to bring home to the accused what the common object was.<sup>1</sup>

1372. Principle.—A person who joins or continues in an unlawful assembly after it has been legally ordered to disperse is guilty of contempt of the lawful authority of a public servant.<sup>2</sup> But this section, and section 151 deal specially with cases arising under this chapter. They are, however, cases of the same kind and are subject to the same rules. The provisions of this section are, however much stricter, and a case falling under this section could not be appropriately punished under section 188.

1373. Meaning of Words.—“ Knowing that such unlawful assembly ” : The knowledge must be both of the unlawful assembly as well as of the fact that it had been commanded to disperse, and that command must have been “ in the manner prescribed by law to disperse.” This evidently contemplates the adoption of a procedure similar to that prescribed by the English Riot Act,<sup>3</sup> under which the command to disperse must be in the form of a proclamation to be made in the King’s name, and in a form there set out. Such a procedure does not obtain in this country, and there is therefore no “ manner ” prescribed by law for dispersing unlawful assemblies.<sup>4</sup>

146. Whenever force or violence is used by an unlawful assembly, or by any member thereof, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, every member of such assembly is guilty of the offence of rioting.

Force—s. 349.]

1374. Analogous Law.—Hawkins defines riot thus : “ A riot is a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three or more persons assembling together of their own authority with an intent mutually to assist one another against any who shall oppose them, in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same, in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful.”<sup>5</sup> In England this definition has been held to be good in cases arising under the Riot Act, which contains no definition of rioting.<sup>6</sup> And the definition here given is a mere adaptation of it.

1375. Principle.—The basis of the law as to rioting is the definition of an unlawful assembly, a riot being simply an unlawful assembly in a particular state of activity, that activity being accompanied by the use of force or violence. It is only the use of force that distinguishes rioting from an unlawful assembly.<sup>7</sup>

1376. Meaning of Words.—“ Force or violence ” : “ Force ” is defined in section 349, and it has been used here in that sense.<sup>8</sup> Violence is force used to any object other than a human being e. g., to a building or other property.<sup>9</sup> “ Or by any member thereof ” : That member must, however, use force in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly. If he uses force for a purpose of his own, he alone is liable.

1377. What constitutes Rioting.—A general analysis of the offence of rioting has been before set out (§ 1375). The offence involves (i) the use of force or violence ; (ii) by an unlawful assembly, or by any member thereof ; (iii) in prosecution of the common object of such assembly. To beign with, then, there can be no riot without an unlawful assembly.

1378. All rioters must then be necessarily members of an unlawful assembly and therefore, even as such, they are liable to punishment under section 143. They are, however, guilty of something more, if they or any of them uses force in prosecution of the common object of that assembly. Now since the force causes motion, rioting is complete as soon as such motion is produced by a member in the manner described in section 349. Force, however slight and producing motion, however inconsiderable, is sufficient to complete rioting.<sup>1</sup> But there must be the actual use of force, and not merely a show of force, and the force used must be in prosecution of the common object. The words "force or violence" vi et armis are taken from the English Law.<sup>2</sup> and while the word "force" implies the use of personal violence, the word "violence" would seem to suggest the use of force to objects or things in terrorem populi; as for example, the show of armour, turbulent gestures or the like. It is not necessary to constitute rioting that personal violence should have been committed.<sup>3</sup> Nor is it necessary that it should have been directed against a number of men. For if sufficient force be used to terrify a single person, the offence is complete, though no other persons were near enough to be within reach of the alarm.<sup>4</sup> The difference between a riot and an unlawful assembly is this: if the parties assemble in a tumultuous manner, and actually execute their purpose with violence, it is a riot; but if they merely meet upon a purpose which, if executed, would make them rioters and having done nothing, they separate without carrying their purpose into effect, it is an unlawful assembly.<sup>5</sup> It is only the use of force that distinguishes rioting from an unlawful assembly.<sup>6</sup> Passive resistance cannot be construed into the use of force or violence. Nor is the mere obstruction to carts and bullocks passing by a particular road, without interfering with the free passage of persons by the same, amounts to the use of criminal force within the meaning of this section.<sup>7</sup>

1379. Sudden Quarrel.—The mere use of force by a number of men assembled does not render all of them liable for rioting. The essence of the offence lies in the use of force to achieve a common purpose. This implies some degree of previous concert and deliberation. For if a number of persons having met together at a fair market, or any other lawful or innocent occasion, happen on a sudden quarrel to fall together by the ears, they are not guilty of a riot, but only of a sudden affray of which none are guilty, but those who actually took part in it, because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happened unexpectedly without any previous intention.<sup>8</sup> So where in the midst of a marriage-procession in a mango-tope a person Tonnerre intruded and asked one of the party by name Noorul Hossein to supply him with coolies and on his stating that the coolies had run away, he began to use forcible language, whereupon Noorul became insolent and put his finger in his mouth, laughing at Tonnerre as he did so. Thereupon Tonnerre knocked his hand out of his mouth which was a signal for the 50 or 60 men assembled to assault him and to drive him out of the place. The men were prosecuted for rioting but it was held that they could not be convicted of that offence. The attack on him was sudden and unpremeditated and was caused no doubt by his striking the head-man of the party Noorul Hossein. None of the assailants knew of Mr. Tonnerre's intention to come to the tope, nor was there any intimation of any movement on their part until Mr. Tonnerre excited their indignation by his conduct to Noorul Hossein. The assembling of these men together in their own marriage-procession was perfectly lawful, and there is not the slightest evidence that they had any evil intention towards any one. And, if this be so, then the disturbance which ensued was not a riot, and there could be no abetment of a riot on the part of the accused.<sup>1</sup>

1380. But it is no riot for a member of the audience in a public theatre to applaud or hiss a performance, but if a number of men come prepared to interrupt the performance by causing a disturbance, it may be rioting, though they may not use any personal violence or cause any injury to the house.<sup>2</sup> So where two parties meet without any intention to quarrel, but all of a sudden a fight ensues, in which both sides use force, it cannot be said to be a case of rioting in the absence of any evidence to prove previous concert,<sup>3</sup> which cannot be inferred from the mere fact of joint action, for such action may have been spontaneous and not necessarily the result of a previous design. Of course, such preconcert and design may be as much the result of mutual understanding as of a previous deliberation, but in such a case there must be facts from which such inference may be drawn. For this purpose the declarations of the parties assembling their badges and banners are all relevant for the purpose of showing their common object.<sup>4</sup>

1381. The common object of the assembly must “of course” be illegal. For there can be no riot where force is employed to vindicate a lawful right. The use of force on such an occasion is not only lawful but commendable.<sup>5</sup> The occasion on which force may be so used is, when one is entitled to the right of private defence. It is then not only lawful for one to use force, but also to use it sufficiently to preserve and protect one’s right (§§ 890-899).

1382. The question whether the unlawful act was committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly is a question of fact to be decided upon the circumstances of each case. As has been already pointed out, a person may participate in the common object only up to a certain time and extent; he cannot then be held responsible for any act of the others done after he had definitely withdrawn from the assembly or had withdrawn his support. This question will have to be presently considered (§§ 1422-1425).

147. Whoever is guilty of rioting, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Punishment for rioting.

1383. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes a punishment for rioting as section 143 prescribes a punishment for being a member of an unlawful assembly. The next section deals with an aggravated form of the same offence, and it thus corresponds with section 144.

1385. Proof.—The Court has, of course, to find on the evidence given by the prosecution whether the charge alleged has been made out. It cannot construct a theory of its own and find it upon the alleged ground of its probability.<sup>6</sup> The petitioners were convicted of ss. 148, 323 and 326-149, some under one, some under all the sections. The riot related to a dispute about possession of land upon which the Sessions Judge found that the riot had not taken place. He also found that the petitioners were in possession of it. The District Magistrate in his explanation combated the view of the Sessions Judge but the High Court refused to go behind the findings of the Sessions Judge, and set aside the convictions under ss. 148 and 326-149 and as regards s. 323 it found that the petitioners had not exceeded the right of private defence.<sup>1</sup> The question whether there is a right of private defence is a matter which can be dealt with by the High Court as a pure point of law.<sup>2</sup> It is competent to the Court to charge the accused with two or more common objects in the alternative and to convict them if at least one of them is proved.<sup>3</sup>

1386. The points requiring proof under this section are :—

- (1) That five or more persons were assembled.<sup>4</sup>
- (2) That they constituted an unlawful assembly, within the meaning of section 141.<sup>5</sup>
- (3) That the accused was a member of that assembly.
- (4) That force or violence was used by any member of that assembly.
- (5) That it was used in prosecution of its common object.

1387. Since the participation of five persons is an essential ingredient of the offence it follows that the acquittal of one or more of them is fatal to the prosecution.<sup>6</sup>

1388. Charge.—The charge under this section must specify the common object of the unlawful assembly (§§ 1327-1347). But the omission to set it out has been held to amount to a mere irregularity and one which does not necessarily vitiate the conviction unless it appears that the omission had prejudiced the accused.<sup>7</sup> Where, therefore, the rioting was in respect of property claimed by the opposing factions, the omission to specify it in the charge would be taken to have prejudiced the accused.<sup>8</sup> But where the accused is charged under this section with the common object of causing grievous hurt to B,<sup>9</sup> where the charge specified one common object and there was no evidence to support an omission by the Magistrate to state that it had been proved, it was held to be a mere irregularity not prejudicing the conviction.<sup>10</sup> But generally speaking, the proof of the common object stated in the charge is a sine qua non to a legal conviction under this section.<sup>11</sup>

1389. Where the common object stated in the charge against the petitioners was to take possession of some property by criminal force, or to enforce a right or supposed right to it, and the Appellate Court found that the opposite party had been trying to encroach upon the land decreed to the petitioners, and that the occurrence was the result of the complication, which the opposite party was trying to introduce by stealthy wrongful acts, it was held that the common object alleged in the charge had not been made out, and that the accused were therefore entitled to be acquitted.<sup>12</sup> Where a charge, as drawn up by the Magistrate, alleges several alternative common objects of the unlawful assembly, and the Magistrate omits to specify any common object as proved, the Appellate Court cannot on that ground alone reverse the conviction; for it is then its duty to see if it is not sustainable by proof of any of the common objects stated.<sup>13</sup> But such common object must be apparent from the evidence.<sup>14</sup> It is a matter of evidence and not of inference and it must be found,<sup>15</sup> though the finding may be an inference deducible from evidence.<sup>16</sup> But the case is manifestly different where there were two possible common objects and it was not apparent which of them had been accepted by the Court.<sup>17</sup> Where the object was assault, there can be no conviction upon proof of arson.<sup>18</sup>

1390. Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was stated to be the causing of obstruction to measurement and demarcation of khas mahalland and the prosecution failed to establish that the land on which the riot was alleged to have taken place was in actual possession of Government, the Court held the charge as laid not proved.<sup>1</sup>

1391. The opposing factions, though each forming an unlawful assembly cannot be both charged and tried jointly as they have not both the same common object.<sup>2</sup> They may have each the object of fighting but the object of an assembly A to fight with B, is not the same as of the assembly B to rout A. The proper procedure in a case of opposing factions is to hold two separate trials, the members of each faction being made witnesses against the others. A conviction for rioting cannot be supported where the common object of the six accused was stated to be to assault the complainant, but the Court found that the object of three of the accused was to seize the complainant's cattle.<sup>3</sup> It is, of course, not open to the Appellate Court to invent a common object not specified in the charge.<sup>4</sup> A smaller number than five might be convicted if there is evidence that five or more persons had taken part in the riot.<sup>5</sup> But unless at least five are shown to have the same common object they cannot be convicted of rioting.<sup>6</sup> Where a person was charged and convicted under this and section 323 his conviction cannot be altered in appeal to one under s. 160.<sup>7</sup> A person cannot be convicted of rioting and the causing of hurt where he has not been charged for it.<sup>8</sup> But it is not illegal to charge a rioter both for rioting and the causing of hurt or grievous hurt and the rest of his confederates for only rioting.<sup>9</sup> But a man charged under this section cannot be convicted under s. 352.<sup>10</sup>

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—were a member of an unlawful assembly, and in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, viz., committed the offence of rioting, punishable under section 147 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1393. Essentials of Unlawful Assembly.—For a general commentary on the essential ingredients of rioting, reference should be made to s. 141 (§§ 1327-1331). In order to justify a conviction under this section all the five points noted before should be proved.

1394. In the first place there must be proof of the assemblage of five or more rioters. The mere presence of five or more persons does not constitute their assembly unlawful; since some of them might be Spectator haud particeps.<sup>11</sup> It is on the prosecution to show that the assembly was unlawful in the sense that term is used in this section. And there must be a finding to that effect in the absence of which the High Court would set aside the conviction.<sup>12</sup> The nexus which binds the assembly is the presence of a common object. It must also be found.<sup>13</sup> That object must, of course, be unlawful. In order to be lawful it must fall under one or more of the five sub-clauses of s. 141. It is not necessary that the object of the assembly should be initially unlawful, what is however, necessary is that no assembly is unlawful, unless its object is shown to be unlawful. But this is not all. Besides being unlawful, the assembly must use force, the use of the least amount of which would suffice to satisfy its requirement.<sup>1</sup> The general principles governing the offence have been set out under section 141. It is proposed here to supplement that commentary.

1395. Cumulative Sentence.—It should also be noted that rioting is a general offence, and other offences of a more specific kind may be committed therein. In that case the question arises whether the rioters cannot be punished both for rioting and the other offence. It has been held in some cases that since rioting involves the use of force, the rioters should not be convicted twice over for committing a single act, such as for example, rioting and trespass,<sup>2</sup> rioting and hurt,<sup>3</sup> and even grievous hurt,<sup>4</sup> but this view is explained in other cases to be confined only to cases in which it is not possible to identify the actual assailants, that is to say, where they are only constructively guilty of that offence under s. 149.<sup>5</sup> But other cases do not recognize this distinction holding that, since the use of force is a necessary ingredient of the offence of rioting, its use could not be treated as a distinct act and separately punished.<sup>6</sup> But of course this would not justify the use of unlimited force, and it is obvious that if in the course of rioting any member commits a specific offence, he is liable to be separately tried therefor. For example, where the common object of an unlawful assembly was to assault the police-officers in the discharge of their duty, and hurt was actually caused to some of them, the accused could not be convicted both under this as well as section 332. In such a case, the proper course is to convict the accused for the specific offence committed by them.<sup>7</sup> But should evidence as to who committed the specific offence be lacking, it is not necessary to frame a separate charge under section 332.<sup>8</sup> So where the common object of the assembly was to overawe the police in the lawful discharge of their duties, the use of criminal force for that purpose being a necessary ingredient to constitute rioting, the accused could not be punished twice over for the same act once for rioting, and then again for assaulting a public servant under section 353 of the Code.<sup>9</sup> Such was also the view taken in a case where in order to execute a sentence of the Panchayat the accused seized the complainant, blackened his face, placed him on a donkey and took him round the village whereupon they were convicted both of this offence as also of s. 355, but their conviction for the latter offence was set aside.<sup>10</sup>

1396. The same rule applies whatever may have been the offence which constitutes the unlawful object of the assembly. It may be mischief theft or abduction. So where several persons were charged with rioting and theft, and the common object of the assembly by which the rioting was caused was theft, it was held that they could not be convicted, both for theft as well as rioting, when the latter was but an element of the former.<sup>11</sup> So where an accused person was found with several others to have entered upon another's land with the common object of cutting the standing crops, and in prosecution of that common object hurt was caused, it was held that the accused could not be convicted and sentenced for criminal trespass as well as for rioting, inasmuch as the common object of the riot and the intention in the criminal trespass were substantially the same.<sup>12</sup> It has, however, been held in some cases that a person may be legally convicted both for rioting as well as for causing hurt,<sup>1</sup> or grievous hurt;<sup>2</sup> but a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court has held otherwise.<sup>3</sup> But this was a case in which the person was accused of grievous hurt by application of section 149, on which ground it was distinguished in two cases of the Punjab Chief Court,<sup>4</sup> who held that there the offence of rioting was not itself complete until the grievous hurt was actually inflicted, that is to say, the causing of the hurt was itself the form of force or violence which constituted the offence of rioting. In any case, it is not open to the Appellate Court to alter a conviction of rioting under this section with the common object of ejecting the complainants from their homestead land to one under section 323 in the absence of a specific charge thereunder.<sup>5</sup>

1398. No Rioting.—It is possible to enumerate several cases in which there was no rioting. For example, where a number of persons went up to rescue another who was assaulted, and in doing so, some of them inflicted hurt and one of them who could not be identified, dealt a fatal blow, it was held that all the members could not be convicted of rioting as there was no unlawful common object, but that those who had caused hurt should be convicted of that offence.<sup>12</sup> A person who exceeds the right of private defence may be guilty of the offence proved against him but he can be only convicted of that offence and the sentence passed on him lenient.<sup>13</sup> It was held to be no riot where the accused went armed to turn out a party of men who had taken possession of, and ploughed up their land, upon which the accused had sown and harvested the crop. As observed before, mere disturbance of possession is not dispossession.<sup>14</sup>

1399. In one case three parties were involved. Party A had grown the crops. Party B cut and carried them away and stacked them in the field of party C. A went armed to recover their crops. C used force to resist A. The latter hit back. They were held justified in using such force as sufficed to repel the attack and recover their crops.<sup>15</sup>

148. Whoever is guilty of rioting, being armed with a deadly weapon or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

1400. Analogous Law.—This section bears the same relation to the last section as section 144 does to its predecessor. The offence for which the enhanced penalty is here provided is aggravated by the presence of deadly weapon (§ 1346).

1401. Procedure and Practice.—The offence under this section is cognizable, and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and triable only by the Court of Session, a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

1402. Proof.—The points requiring proof are all those required to establish an offence under the last section (§ 1385), in addition to which must be proved the following :—

- (6) That the accused was armed with a deadly weapon, or with something which used as a weapon of offence was likely to cause death.<sup>1</sup>

1403. Charge.—The charge should specify that the accused was armed with a deadly weapon, and it should then run thus :—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—, were a member of an unlawful assembly and did, in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, namely, commit the offence of rioting with a deadly weapon (or which used as a weapon of offence was likely to cause death) to wit—and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 148 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

1404. Meaning of Words.—“ Whoever.....being armed,” i.e., only the person so armed can be convicted under this section.<sup>2</sup> For the meaning of the other words used in this section reference should be made to the commentary under section 144, where the terms here used have been explained.

149. If an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object every person who, at the time of the committing of that offence, is a member of the same assembly, is guilty of that offence.

1405. Analogous Law.—A person may be constructively liable for an offence which he has not actually committed by reason of his being a member of a conspiracy to commit such offence, or because he was a member of an unlawful assembly, the members whereof knew that an offence committed by one of them was likely to be committed, or that it was the common intention of all to commit such offence. The first case is covered by s. 120-A, the second by this section and the third by s. 34. The distinction between these three cases of constructive liability has been dealt with under s. 34.<sup>3</sup>

1406. Procedure and Practice.—The procedure on trial for an offence under this section depends upon the nature of the offence committed. The offence is, however, in any case non-compoundable. Where riot was committed by two opposing factions, they must each be separately tried.<sup>4</sup> Since this section mixes

a person constructively liable for an offence committed by another, it is conceivable that he might be convicted both of being a rioter and for committing the offence; e. g., offences under s. 147 and s. 452.<sup>1</sup>

1407. Proof.—The points calling for proof to establish an offence under this section are:—

- (1) That there was an unlawful assembly; (S. 141 & com.)
- (2) That the accused was a member thereof; (S. 142.)
- (3) That he intentionally joined or continued in that assembly;
- (4) That he knew of the common object of the assembly;
- (5) That an offence was committed by a member of such assembly;
- (6) That it was committed—
  - (a) either in prosecution of the common object of the assembly, or
  - (b) such as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of their common unlawful object.<sup>2</sup>

1408. In order to render a person liable for his constructive criminality, the terms of the section must be strictly fulfilled. It must, for instance, be proved by the prosecution that the accused was a member of the unlawful assembly at the time the offence, for which he is held liable, was committed. It must, moreover, be shewn that the offence was committed by a member, known or unknown, of the unlawful assembly of which the accused is shown to have been a member.<sup>3</sup> Again, the section has no application where there is no unlawful assembly. So if the accused persons are acquitted of rioting they cannot be properly convicted of grievous hurt under s. 325 by the application of this section, which creates constructive liability, whereas s. 325 punishes the actual offender.<sup>4</sup>

1409. Charge.—The charge framed under this section should state with certainty, and accuracy, the exact nature of the charge brought against the accused. This is, of course, generally true in all cases, but it is especially true in a case where it is sought to implicate him for acts not committed by himself, but by others with whom he was in company.<sup>5</sup> So in a case tried by a jury, it is the duty of the judge not only to specify the common object in the charge, but in commenting upon this section expressly draw their attention to the common object.<sup>6</sup> A person charged for a constructive offence, e. g., s. 325 read with this section, cannot be convicted of the substantive offence under s. 325.<sup>7</sup> On the other hand, it is said that a person charged under s. 353 alone might be convicted of that offence read with this section, though he was not so charged. But this case was really decided with reference to the prejudice caused to the accused and should not be taken as a decision for omitting a specific charge under this section.<sup>8</sup>

1410. The charge under this section should run thus:—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—, were a member of an unlawful assembly, and in prosecution of the common object of which, namely,—(specify the object) one of the members of the said assembly caused (specify the offence) to—, and you are there-by under section 149 of the Indian Penal Code, guilty of causing the said offence which is punishable under section—of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

1411. Principle.—The Court prescribes three cases of constructive liability, some of which would overlap in practice. The widest liability is where two or more persons agree to commit an illegal act, in which case they become members of a conspiracy, but not of a criminal conspiracy punishable under s. 120-B for which one of them must do some overt act in pursuance of the agreement. This section requires the consensus of five persons to do an unlawful act prohibited by s. 141, in addition to which, in order to create a liability under this section, there must be proof that the accused knew that the offence committed by one member of the assembly was likely to be committed by any of them. As such, the rule here enacted is, as regards the mens rea, somewhat wider than that enacted in s. 34. Though both deal with constructive liability, that is to say, liability for an act not actually done by the accused.

1412. Meaning of Words.—“Offence” in this section means an offence punishable by this Code, and not by a special or local law, e. g., the Railway’s Act.<sup>1</sup> “In prosecution of the common object” : “In prosecution” here means in furtherance of the common object.<sup>2</sup> “Object” is distinct from “intention” mentioned in s. 34. A and B both start to kill C. A intends to do so because he is C’s enemy ; B because he wishes to rob him. Here the object of both A and B is to kill C, but their intentions differ.<sup>3</sup> The prosecution must be both in fact as well as in intention, “or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely,” in which case the offence need not be in prosecution of the common object. The word “or” is disjunctive and divides the two provisos. The knowledge of likelihood must come home to all the members, and not only to some of them. Indeed, if the knowledge of some only were sufficient, the test would be easy to satisfy, and the rule as good as neutralized, for, the actual offender would be presumed to possess such knowledge and that alone would be sufficient to fasten liability upon all. The word “knew” is not the same as “might have known” and implies the existence of facts from which a certain inference is so irresistible as to amount to a certainty.<sup>4</sup> This knowledge must be shown to exist at the time of the commission of the offence, and not knowledge acquired in the light of subsequent events.<sup>5</sup> “Every person who is—a member” : The words “at the time of the commission of the offence” are important and imply that only persons who continue to be members of the unlawful assembly up to the time the offence is committed, are liable for it.

1413. Conditions of Constructive Liability.—This section bears a close analogy to other sections of the Code, e. g., sections 34 and 111. The former section is more general, and it makes co-responsibility depend upon common intention. Section 111 defines the liability of the abettor for a different act done, if it is inter alia done in pursuance of the conspiracy, or if it was the probable consequence of the abetment. These provisions are closely analogous to the provisions of this section under which the liability of a rioter for the act of his confederate is made to depend upon similar contingencies. It is, indeed, evident that were it not for this section the accused’s case would have been met by either of those sections, but this section has been enacted to declare him liable as a principal, and not merely as an abettor. But in so enhancing his liability the section takes care to restrict it by three exacting conditions which must be all strictly fulfilled and the non-fulfilment of any one is sufficient to absolve him. The section is not intended to subject a member of an unlawful assembly to punishment for every offence which is committed by any one of its members during the time they are engaged in the prosecution of the common object.<sup>6</sup> Assuming that the accused was a member of an unlawful assembly, three other conditions must be fulfilled before he can be held responsible : (a) the offence must have been committed in prosecution of the common object (§ 1328) or (b) the offence must be such as the members knew to be likely, and (c) the accused must have been a member of the assembly at the time the offence was committed (§ 1355). The first condition would cover an offence committed.

1414. Prosecution of the Object.—Now, by a member of an unlawful assembly engaged in prosecuting the common object, and acting with the purpose of executing such object, the commission of which executed or extended to execute the common object. The second condition refers to an offence committed by such member, acting with such purpose, the commission of which did not execute or tend to execute the common object, but which offence was likely, to the knowledge of the members of the assembly, to be committed by a person so engaged, acting with such purpose.<sup>1</sup> The third condition is obviously necessary, for a person cannot be held responsible for an offence committed by an assembly from which he had withdrawn, and the object of which he may no longer have approved. This gives even a rioter a locus pœnitentiæ.

1416. But in such cases, the first condition can seldom be dissociated from the second. For suppose that in the case assumed, one of the members goes armed with a loaded gun, should the members then have presumed that there may be bloodshed and even murder? It is evident that such a presumption cannot be made from the mere possession of a gun by a member of an unlawful assembly.<sup>5</sup> For they may be perfectly aware that their opponents being unarmed would offer no resistance. The question is, therefore, a question of fact to be determined upon all the circumstances of each case. If suppose, in the example given, the party in possession were unarmed and numerically inferior, the aggressors could not be deemed to know that dispossession was only possible with loss of life. In such a case if the persons in possession offer unexpected resistance, and one of the aggressors thereupon fires his gun, killing one of his adversaries, the other members could not be held liable for his act which was not done in prosecution of the common object.<sup>6</sup> But if in such a case the unlawful assembly had been formed to commit an assault upon another person, the liability of the members might have varied, for the Court might then have assumed that the loaded gun was taken for that purpose.

1418. The case is covered by the rule that where persons prepare themselves to resist all opposition, they are then all jointly responsible for the result, whatever may have been their individual expectations (§§ 262-291). So where persons encourage their confederates to strike, and thereupon an assault is committed, all have been held to be jointly liable for the result,<sup>6</sup> if they knew that it was likely. But where a party had started to give a severe beating to their opponents and in the course of the fight death was caused, but it was not possible to ascertain the various persons who struck each of the persons who were killed, though one of them was found to have been the first to knock down one of the deceased, it was held that he was guilty not of murder but of culpable homicide and that the rest of the assembly were all guilty of grievous hurt since it could be safely presumed that it was what they had all intended.<sup>7</sup>

1419. Liability Determined by Knowledge.—This raises the second question: Did the accused know that the offence committed was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object of the assembly? The expression "hnew to be likely to be committed" imports at least an expectation founded upon facts known to all the members of the assembly, that an offence of the particular kind committed would be committed. It means something more than a speculation that such an offence might happen to be committed.<sup>8</sup> As Pontifex, J., remarked in the Full Bench case already referred to “the word ‘knew’ used in the second branch of the section, is, I think, advisedly used, and cannot be made to bear the sense of ‘might have been known’.”<sup>1</sup>

1420. But as Couch, C.J., observed in the same case: “There does not seem to be much distinction between the two parts of the section, and.....the cases which would be within the first offences committed in prosecution of the common object would be generally, if not always, within the second, namely, offences which the parties knew to be likely to be committed in the prosecution of the common object.”<sup>2</sup> A case of this kind may occur in a case like this. Persons assemble with a view to attacking and plundering the house of a particular person; that would be an unlawful assembly, and the common object of the assembly would be house-breaking or the other offences which would be included in such acts, as attacking and plundering a man’s house; but from some cause, such as a show of resistance, they might not continue to prosecute that common object; and before they had dispersed, and whilst they continued to be an unlawful assembly, some of them might plunder another house, and thereby commit an offence. Such a case might come within the second part of the section, as an offence which the members of the unlawful assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object but which was not committed in the prosecution of it.<sup>3</sup>

1421. In order to make a man liable under this clause two things are essential: (a) that the offence should have been committed in prosecution of the common object; and (b) that all the members of the unlawful assembly must have known that such an offence was likely to be committed. In this, as in the previous case, the question is again one of fact, dependent upon the proved circumstances of each case. Of course, the knowledge here spoken of is not, and indeed, cannot be, sensual perception of a fact, for that fact is still to be. Knowledge must then necessarily mean consciousness of such facts from which an inference as to the happening of a certain result is probable. Thus, if five men go out armed with heavy lathies to attack another party of men, and one of them alone inflicts grievous hurt, all the five may be convicted of causing grievous hurt, for the grievous hurt was an incident, which each and all of them must, as reasonable men, have known was likely to occur in the prosecution of such common object.<sup>4</sup> But if in such a case one of the accused armed himself with a gun, should the others have known that death was likely to be caused? The carrying of a gun was undoubtedly a fact from which the accused may infer that death may be caused, but its livelihood cannot be necessarily inferred, for it depends upon other circumstances (§§ 1422-1425).

1422. Limits of Constructive Liability.—Now a person may join an unlawful assembly with an unlawful object, but it does not necessarily follow, that he indorses all that the other members say or do. Nor is he therefore responsible for their acts of which he was not clearly cognizant. For example, two persons may be induced by another to assist him in thrashing his enemy with whom he had had a quarrel. They may consent to lend him their assistance so far, but if he had secretly planned to kill him and does so, they cannot be held responsible for his act.<sup>5</sup> This shows that members of an unlawful assembly may have a community of object only up to a certain point, beyond which they may differ in their objects, and the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object will vary, not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object, and as a consequence the effect of this section may be different on different members of the same unlawful assembly.<sup>6</sup> In dealing with such cases, it is on the one hand, necessary for the protection of accused persons, that they should not, merely by reason of their association with others as members of the unlawful assembly, be held criminally liable for offences committed by their associates, which they themselves neither intended nor knew to be likely to be committed; on the other hand, it is equally necessary for the protection of peace that members of an unlawful assembly should not lightly be let off from suffering the penalties of offences for which, though committed by others, the law has made them liable by reason of their association with the actual offenders with one common object.<sup>1</sup>

1423. The first requisite of the rule is, that the person sought to be held liable for the act of another should have been at the time of the commission of the offence, a member of the unlawful assembly. If therefore being as such, he took part in the fight, but being wounded he had to retire to attend to his own injuries, he could not then be convicted under this section for murder, if subsequently committed in the fight if continued.<sup>2</sup> In such a case he may still cherish a desire to rejoin his comrades, but being unable to encourage or assist them, he could be said to belong to an assembly which he was powerless to help. So if after the object of an unlawful assembly had been accomplished, one of the rioters entered into an altercation with another, causing him injury, the other members of his party could not be held liable for his act, for the community of purpose had then ceased. So where A was legally entitled to fish, and B illegally attempted to catch fish in A's waterhole, whereupon A's party came armed with sticks and drove off B and his men, who were in full fight when C, one of B's party entered into an altercation with D, who was A's partisan and whom he struck with a fish-spear, it was held that C alone was liable for the specific injury caused under the circumstances.<sup>3</sup> So if a number of men composing two parties A and D, go out to demand rent, and in doing so, they both abuse C, whereupon one D ordered E to seize A, and he thought that the best means of securing him was to knock him down first, for which he dealt him a blow and killed him. Here B's party could not be said to be members of the unlawful assembly, of which A and his men were members. And as regards C, though he had taken part in abusing A, and though he was a spectator of the scene enacted between E and A, he could not be held liable with E for the homicide of A, because he did not share with him in that object, nor did he do anything to abet E.<sup>4</sup> In another case, the accused had started armed with spears to forcibly bring away a woman from the custody of persons, who then knew, would resist her removal. In the struggle which ensued the accused speared the woman and her defenders with the result that the woman died of injuries and the others were seriously wounded. It was held that, since they did not start with the preconcert of bringing the woman dead or alive, the only offence of which they could be convicted were those punishable under ss. 147 and 326.<sup>5</sup>

1424. Of course, a person who joins an assembly after an offence has been committed, cannot be held guilty of that offence by reason of his association with the assembly, for the words of the section require that he must have been a member of that assembly at the time of the commission of the offence. If, therefore, offences are committed by a fluctuating body of men, it is upon the prosecution to show that at least five persons of whom the accused was one constituted an unlawful assembly, and that the offence in question was committed by any one of them under the circumstances stated in the section. During the plague riots in Patna in 1900, the District Magistrate appointed three prominent citizens, one of whom was Nowrangi, as special constables, to carry out which order, one Baker, Inspector of Police, had been deputed. He ordered the three men to accompany him to the police station which they refused, upon which he ordered a constable to arrest Nowrangi, whereupon the villagers assembled in large numbers, abused and threatened the police. Nowrangi shook himself free of the constables and two other men ran up and seized the constable's carbine. The police then hastily retreated from the village. Some of the villagers and the three constables-elect were then prosecuted under section 353 coupled with this section. But the Court held that the accused could not be convicted under section 353 of the Code, as the Inspector had no power to arrest Nowrangi, but that inasmuch as all the villagers had combined to assault the police, they were held guilty of rioting, though under extenuating circumstances.<sup>1</sup>

1425. Again, before other persons could be convicted under this section, it is essential that an offence must have been committed by any member of the unlawful assembly. This evidently means that there cannot be a constructive offender under this section, unless there is proof not merely that an offence was committed but also that it was committed by a person who was a member of the unlawful assembly. If, therefore, death was not the result of the injury caused by a member of the assembly, who was charged as being only liable for it by reason of the provisions of section 34, which provides for another case of constructive liability, he could not be said to have committed the murder so as to make the other members liable for it by a double construction.<sup>2</sup>

150. Whoever hires or engages, or employs, or promotes, or connives at the hiring, engagement or employment of any person to join or become a member of any unlawful assembly, shall be punishable as a member of such unlawful assembly ; and for any offence which may be committed by any such person as a member of such unlawful assembly, in pursuance of such hiring, engagement or employment, in the same manner as if he had been a member of such unlawful assembly, or himself had committed such offence.

1426. Analogous Law.—This section was not in the original draft and was added to approach those who could not be reached by the law of abetment. As such, it is probably too loosely worded, for whoever “hires, engages or employs” another, is clearly an abettor. But this section has not been enacted to punish an abettor, but one who though not an abettor still “promotes or connives” at the formation of an unlawful assembly. A master may, for instance, “connive” at his servant forming a riotous assembly in his interest. He may even put him in funds for that purpose. In the former case he merely encourages by his acquiescence, in the latter case he promotes the scheme by his active assistance. But in both cases his liability is the same, and it is in every case co-extensive with that of his mercenaries.

1427. The provisions of this section should be compared with those of s. 157 which are of even wider application. For while this section deals with a particular unlawful assembly, section 157 refers to the harbouring, etc., of persons who are likely to be engaged in any unlawful assembly,<sup>3</sup> while section 158 punishes the person so hiring himself out.

1428. Procedure and Practice.—The offence under this section is cognizable and not compoundable. In other respects it follows the procedure for the offence committed.

1429. Proof.—The points calling for proof are :—

- (1) That some person was hired, engaged or employed to join an unlawful assembly ;
- (2) That this was done by the accused or that he ‘promoted or connived’ at his hiring, etc.;
- (3) In the latter case, that he was aware of the fact that the person was engaged to join an unlawful assembly ;
- (4) That the accused was legally bound to prevent the hiring, etc.;
- (5) That he was physically able to prevent it ;
- (6) That he did not prevent it, or do all in his power towards preventing it.

(2) Jhuboo, 8 C. 739 (751).

(3) Ram Lochan Sircar, 29 C. 214.

1430. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows :—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—hired one—(or engaged or employed or promoted or connived at the hiring or engagement or employment of—to join as (or become) a member of an unlawful assembly [ (if necessary add), and that the said—as a member of such unlawful assembly in pursuance of such hiring (or engagement or employment) committed an offence under section—of the Indian Penal Code] and you have thereby committed an offence under section 150 and are punishable under section—add the substantive offence) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

1431. Principle.—The principle of this section has been already stated (§ 1426). It has been designed to meet a case of persons who are neither abettors nor participators of the crime committed by unlawful assemblies, but who, nevertheless, assist to bring unlawful assemblies into existence, and to whose co-operation and support they may owe their vitality of existence. Such a person is an “ aider ” though not an “ abettor ” in the terminology of English Law, and his liability is here set out.

1432. Meaning of Words.—“ Hires, engages or employs ”: The last word is general enough to cover all that is intended to be conveyed by the three words. Hiring is engaging for a stipulated reward, and engaging is employing one for a definite purpose, while employing one is to make use of one generally. “ Promotes or connives at ”: These words are important. The “ promotion ” of hiring engagement or employment is the rendering of active support and assistance ; while “ conniving ” is closing the eyes upon a fault. It is allowing it without encouraging or even approving of it. It implies a state of mind in which disapproval of the act is joined to a desire not to oppose it. “ And for any offence.....in pursuance of such hiring, ” that is, the employer is responsible for the act of his employée, done within the scope of his employment.

1433. Liability for Criminal Connivance.—Though this section is perhaps too generally worded, still the class of persons it is intended to reach is clear (§§ 1426, 1431). Persons who are neither co-conspirators nor abettors, but who nevertheless, hire or employ men and thus call conspiracies and unlawful assemblies into being are no less guilty than those who counsel and take part in them. In one sense such persons are abettors, but the law of abetment requires proof which may be lacking in their case. If they keep aloof and leave the work of hiring to their agent or manager, the latter may be tried as abettors, but the former may probably succeed in evading the ordinary law. The section, therefore, extends not only to acts of instigation by masters, but also to acts of instigation when done by others under their direction or connivance. Three sections refer to offences of this nature. This section, it will be observed, deals only with the hiring of a person to join a particular unlawful assembly. In other words, there can be no offence under this section, unless there was an unlawful assembly with or without the new recruit hired by the accused. If, therefore, a person in possession of property engaged a number of lathials to prevent entry thereupon of his nephew, who was jointly interested therein, and the finding of the Magistrate was that he was collecting and harbouring men for the purpose of committing a riot, should he find it his interest to do so, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section, because there was no finding (a) that there had been any unlawful assembly of the men hired by the accused, and (b) that in the course of the assembly any offence had been committed for which the accused would be liable equally with those who were members of that assembly.<sup>1</sup> But the second condition is not a necessary ingredient of an offence under this section, and the first condition had probably reference only to the particular facts of the case.

1434. S. 157 Distinguished. The section speaks of hiring a person "to join or become a member of any unlawful assembly," which, strictly speaking, postulates the existence of an unlawful assembly apart from and independently of the hired recruit, for no one can be said to join an unlawful assembly, unless such an assembly was already complete as an unlawful assembly. If, therefore, there were four men united in an unlawful purpose within the meaning of section 141, and the accused hired a person to join them, thus completing an unlawful assembly, properly speaking he could not be convicted of an offence under this section. But this was probably not the intention of the Legislature, who have used the words "join and continue in an assembly" to include joining not only an assembly already formed, but also an assembly which becomes unlawful after they have joined. In this sense, all that is necessary to complete an offence under this section is, that either with or without the person hired there should be an unlawful assembly, and the accused should have either hired that person or connived at his hiring for the assembly. In this respect section 157 is rather wider as it provides for an occurrence that may happen, and makes the harbouring, receiving or assembling of persons who are likely to be engaged in any unlawful assembly an offence.<sup>1</sup> But the two sections provide for different contingencies. Under section 150 the accused may hire or connive at the hiring of a man to join or form an unlawful assembly. He may not harbour him. Under section 157 the accused may harbour such a person, though he did not hire him. The one section contemplates the existence of an unlawful assembly and the other contemplates its imminence. Neither of them, however, warrants the conviction of a person without proof of the particular facts therein set out, and on the sole ground of preventing an apprehended breach of the peace. So the mere assembling of a number of lathials in one's house is not an offence falling under either section. It may be a fit subject for an executive action; but it is not an offence.

1435. The section requires that in hiring the men, the accused should not only have some ulterior object in view, but his object must have been to constitute or strengthen an unlawful assembly formed or forming. It is thus on the prosecution to establish that the accused had this object in view, and that he had either hired or had "promoted" or "connived at" the hiring of men for that purpose. A person who encourages one to join an unlawful assembly would probably be as much an abettor as the real promoter of that assembly. Even promotion may be both by active co-operation as well as by indirect assistance, as where a zemindar finances his lessee to maintain an army of men as his own retainers. If he offers them any facilities, he may be proceeded against either under this section or section 157. It is not so difficult to establish "promotion" as to prove one's connivance at the hiring of men to form an unlawful assembly. The word connivance implies possession of the power or control over a thing connived at. It is not the duty of every person to prevent the formation of unlawful assemblies, wherever and for whatever purpose formed. Consequently, it is not connivance at the employment of men, where one has neither the right nor the power to prevent it. The section can, therefore, only apply to a case where the accused was under some legal obligation to prevent the hiring of men for the purpose. There can be no connivance at an act without such legal obligation. He must be legally bound to prevent the assemblage. He must have knowledge of its formation, and he must need physical ability to prevent it. If he does not interfere through sheer helplessness, he could not be convicted for criminal connivance.

151. Whoever knowingly joins or continues in any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after such assembly has been lawfully commanded to disperse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Knowingly joining or continuing in assembly of five or more persons after it has been commanded to disperse.

(1) Ram Lochan Sircar, 29 C. 214.

Explanation.—If the assembly is an unlawful assembly within the meaning of section 141, the offender will be punishable under section 145.

1436. Analogous Law.—Reference to this section has already been made while discussing the analogous provisions of section 145. It should be read subject to the provisions of that section, and of section 127 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which confers on a Magistrate and an officer in charge of a police-station, the power to disperse an unlawful or any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace. Refusal to disperse in obedience to lawful command thus made, is punishable either under section 145 or this section, according to the character of the assembly (§ 1366). If the number falls short of five persons, the case may be one for disposal under section 188 of the Code.

1437. Procedure and Practice.—The offence under this section is cognizable, but summons should issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate, and may be tried summarily.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) That there was an assembly of five or more persons ;
- (2) That it was likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace ;
- (3) That it had been commanded to disperse ;
- (4) That such command was lawful ;
- (5) That the accused joined or continued in the assembly, after it had been so commanded to disperse ;
- (6) That he did so knowingly.

1439. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“That you—on or about the —day of —at—joined (or continued in) an assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after knowing that such assembly had been lawfully commanded to disperse, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 151 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1440. Principle.—Section 145 punishes continuance in an unlawful assembly after it has been lawfully ordered to disperse. This section punishes the same act, where the assembly was not unlawful, but was “likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace.” Such an assembly may have been perfectly lawful, and it does not become unlawful after it has been commanded to disperse ; but inasmuch as its continuance is likely to endanger public peace, law has armed the Magistrates and the police with power to disperse it by force if necessary, and it penalizes those who refuse to disperse after receiving a lawful mandate to that effect. (§ 1366).

1441. Meaning of Words.—“Knowingly joins or continues” : The joining or the continuance must have been after “knowing” the command to disperse. The word “knowingly” here then means “wilfully.” “Lawfully commanded to disperse” : The lawfulness of the command is its most essential element. If the command was unlawful, there is no offence in refusing to obey it. Its lawfulness then must have been made obvious to the accused. In Bombay the command to disperse must be as prescribed by s. 40 (1) of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902. A command by a Magistrate is insufficient.<sup>2</sup>

1442. Disorderly Assemblies.—This and the section 145 provide penalties for an offence which, in both cases, consists of the disobedience to the legal mandate of the law, the difference in punishment in the two cases being due to the fact that while the assembly ordered to disperse was in the one case unlawful, it was not so in the other case ; and its dispersal was only ordered because it was menacing public peace ; in short, because it was turbulent. In such a case the act, though lawful in itself, is prohibited on account of the danger which it may cause to the public tranquillity.<sup>3</sup>

(1) S. 200 (a), Cr. P. C.

(2) Keshav, 60 I. C. (B.) 1008.

(3) Mhd. Abdullah, 15 L. 610.

1443. But in order to make a person liable, it must be shown that the command was lawfully given. This implies that the person commanding had both the jurisdiction as well as reason to order dispersal of the meeting. And they are both questions of fact, dependent upon the powers possessed by the officer ordering the dispersal as well as the grounds upon which it was ordered. The first question depends upon the construction of section 127 of the Procedure Code. That section empowers "any Magistrate or officer in charge of a police-station" to command the dispersal of a turbulent assembly. It is then sufficient to show that the officer ordering the dispersal was either a Magistrate, stipendiary or honorary, or an officer in charge of a police-station—a term which necessarily includes his superior supervising officers, that is to say, those who, though not actually in charge of a police-station, are still in superior executive control of it, or of the officer in charge of it.<sup>1</sup>

1444. The next question presents some difficulties. For it requires for its validity that the order should not be passed unless there is an assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace. Here in the first place there must be an "assembly." Now strictly speaking an assembly is "a company of persons gathered together in one place for some common purpose."<sup>2</sup> But this is not the sense in which the term has been used here, for it is immaterial for the purpose of this section, whether the assembly was stationary or moving, compact or scattered.<sup>3</sup> It is sufficient if there was a concourse of five or more men for a common purpose. If such an assembly existed, it is next necessary to see whether it was likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace. The question is, of course, one of fact, but it is one which it is for the prosecution to establish to the satisfaction of the Court. It is not sufficient to establish a charge under this section that in the opinion of the Magistrate or the police-officer who gave the command the assembly was likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace,<sup>4</sup> to admit the opinions of such persons in cases in which the legality of their very act is in question, would be to make them judges in their own cases.

1445. Of course, evidence on the question of a future contingency must necessarily consist more or less of opinions, but they must be opinions based upon facts and not be merely arbitrary. If suppose a religious body of men march out in a procession, the likelihood of their causing a disturbance will depend upon their popularity in the neighbourhood, the temper and attitude of the people towards them and the existence of opposing factions interested in opposing them. So where the Salvation Army insisted upon their right to march out in procession through the streets of Bombay, in spite of an order prohibiting them from so proceeding, the Court considered the opinions of the policemen who knew the people of Bombay as obviously valuable, though "the Magistrate himself must look to the surrounding circumstances, and from his own conclusions, whether the acts committed were reasonably likely to lead to a breach of the peace."<sup>5</sup> But the legality of the order does not solely depend upon the imminence of danger to public peace. That is no doubt one conduct which renders the assembly liable to dispersal. But the lawfulness of the command does not depend solely upon that consideration. If it did, it would place a man's liberty at the mercy of the mob. Suppose a number of Hindoos in accordance with their ancient rites have been in the habit of marching out in procession with their gods through the streets of a town. Are they to be prevented from doing so, merely because a number of ruffians belonging to another creed take upon themselves to oppose their procession? Would it be a legal command to order dispersal of the procession from the fear of persons riotously inclined? Would it not rather be more legal to strengthen the processions by the assistance of the police and to vindicate its right undeterred by the threats of the opposing faction?

Peace. It may be added that an exactly similar case arose about the same time and in connection with the same organization in Bombay, but in that case the rule laid down was very different.<sup>1</sup> In both cases the Salvation Army asserted their right to march out in procession, in both cases they led processions in spite of legal prohibitions. They were prosecuted in both cases, but while in England their right to proceed in procession was upheld, that right was denied in Bombay. This difference could scarcely be casual, for if the two cases were rightly decided there must be a difference in the laws of the two countries. But this is not the case, for in both laws, the right to proceed in procession is conceded, and in both it is made subservient to public peace. Why should then the Salvation Army have the right to march in procession in England, though they have no such right in Bombay? The heterogenous creeds and population of the latter place may dictate a different rule of law, but it cannot change its construction.

1447. It is submitted that the true rule applicable to such cases is this. The Magistrate cannot prohibit a lawful gathering merely because it may endanger public tranquillity. To hold otherwise would be to place one section of the community at the mercy of another, who may from bigotry or other cause choose to oppose them. In such a case it is not only lawful but right that the persons exercising their lawful right should be assisted and those opposing them should be punished. The question then is one of justice and not one of political or public expediency, and the civil authorities would well be within their rights, if they vindicated the liberties of the people, by the use of force, rather than suffer one sect to be overawed by the show of force by another.

1448. But this is a rule which applies only when some substantial right or custom is endangered. It could not obviously be extended to every function, however remotely connected with the main right. For example, it would be right for persons to march out in procession in accordance with their ancient usage; but it would be no denial of their right if they are restrained from marching with noisy bands and carrying the symbols of their faith, offensive to another community.

152. Whoever assaults, or threatens to assault, or obstructs or attempts to obstruct, any public servant, in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, in endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly or to suppress a riot or affray, or uses, or threatens or attempt to use criminal force to such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Riot—s. 146.

Affray—s. 159.

Criminal force—s. 350.

Assault—s. 351.]

1449. Analogous Law.—The last section dealt with passive resistance to the lawful command of a public servant. This section deals with active opposition offered to him. Consequently the enhanced sentence.

1450. Procedure and Practice.—The offence under this section is cognizable, and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable and not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

1451. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That an unlawful assembly was held ;
- (2) That an endeavour was made to disperse it;
- (3) That the person so endeavouring was a public servant ;
- (4) That the said public servant was then acting in the discharge of his duty as such public servant ;
- (5) That the accused knew of it ;
- (6) That he assaulted, or obstructed, or threatened to assault or obstruct him or to use criminal force or attempted to use criminal force.

(1) Tucker, 7 B., 42, decided on 28th September 1882, in which no reference was made to the English rule ; probably its report had not then reached Bombay.

1452. Charge.—The charge must specify the person assaulted. It is not sufficient to say that the accused “obstructed members of the police force.”<sup>1</sup> A person who commits the offence of rioting, grievous hurt, and assaulting a public servant in the execution of his duty, may be charged with and convicted of offences under sections 147, 352, and this section.<sup>2</sup>

1453. The charge may run thus :—

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—assaulted (or threatened to assault or used or threatened to use criminal force to)—a public servant, in the discharge of his duty as such public servant in endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly (or to suppress a riot or affray), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 152 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

1454. Active Resistance to Suppression of Riots.—This section punishes an active opposition made to a public servant in the discharge of his duty, as such public servant. In the first place, as the section is worded, it is not necessary that the public servant concerned should be then employed in the lawful discharge of his duties. He is protected, because he acts in a moment of imminent danger, and he is protected if he acts in good faith under colour of his office, though his act may not be strictly justifiable by law.<sup>3</sup> It is, of course otherwise, if his act causes the apprehension of death or grievous hurt in which case there is the right of private defence.

1455. The gist of the offence described in the section consists of the use of force on a public servant with a view to deterring him, or which has the effect of deterring him from the discharge of his duty. It must therefore be shown not only that the public servant was then on duty, but also that he was then as a part of his duty endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly. If therefore he was not actually so engaged, an assault on him may be an offence, but it is not the offence described in this section. Again, the section speaks only of an unlawful assembly, a riot and an affray. It does not refer to a lawful assembly likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, spoken of in the last section. The special provisions of this section, therefore, would not apply to an assault committed on a public servant while dispersing such an assembly. Persons found guilty under this section cannot be also separately sentenced under sections 332 and 333 of the Code, inasmuch as the infliction of hurt constitutes the essence of the offence under this section.<sup>4</sup>

153. Whoever maliciously, or wantonly, by doing anything which is Wantonly giving provocation, with intent to cause riot. illegal, gives provocation to any person intending or knowing it to be likely that such provocation will cause the offence of rioting to be committed, shall, if the offence of rioting be committed in consequence of such provocation, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both ; and, if the offence of rioting be not committed, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.
 if rioting be committed.
 if not committed.

1456. Analogous Law.—This section deals with a person who does an illegal act which incites one to commit rioting, and when it does not amount to an instigation of rioting, for in such a case he will be dealt with as an abettor. The section rather contemplates mischievous provocation of a person to commit the offence. But it is nevertheless merely a provocation, and falls short of instigation. Again, that provocation is not benevolent but malignant, not solicited but wanton. It may be an appeal to a man's vanity or his sense of honour.

(3) S. 99.

(4) Ferasat, 19 C. 105; Bana Punja, 17 B. 260.

1457. The words "malignantly" and "wantonly" have been nowhere defined. They have only been used in this section, the word "malignantly" occurring once again in section 270.

1458. Procedure and Practice.—The offence under this section is divided into two parts according as the provocation given results, or does not result, in rioting. In the former case the offence is one in which a warrant may issue in the first instance, otherwise a summons should issue. In both cases the offence is cognizable and bailable. In either case it is not compoundable. But in both cases it is triable by any Magistrate. And if the rioting provoked has not been committed it may be tried summarily.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) That the accused did something illegal ;
- (2) That it was done either malignantly or wantonly ;
- (3) That his act gave the provocation ;
- (4) That he knew that his act was likely to give the provocation ;
- (5) And that the provocation so given was likely to cause a riot ;
- (6) That a riot was committed in consequence of such provocation.

1460. The last element is, however, not necessary to prove the offence. If proved, it aggravates the offence and exposes the offender to the enhanced penalty provided in the first clause. A conviction of this offence is not a conviction of an offence "involving a breach of peace" within the meaning of s. 106 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, justifying the taking of security under that section.<sup>2</sup>

1461. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

"That you—on or about the—day of—at—malignantly (or wantonly) by doing an illegal act, namely,—gave provocation to—intending (or knowing it to be likely) that such provocation would cause the offence of rioting to be committed, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 153 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1462. Principle.—Law has always looked upon with disfavour officious inter-meddlers whether they provoked one to maintain a civil suit for the enforcement of his rights, or whether it provokes him to take the law into his own hands, and thus commit a breach of the peace. In the one case the offence is one of maintenance, and in the other the offence is punishable under this section. But the leading features of the two offences are the same—officious interference with another person.

1463. Meaning of Words.—"Malignantly or wantonly": Malignantly means maliciously.<sup>3</sup> The word "malignity" means virulent enmity and "malignantly" therefore means in a manner virulently inimical.<sup>4</sup> It implies a disposition bent on evil. The word "wantonly" means recklessly,<sup>5</sup> thoughtlessly, without regard for right or consequences. It implies a disposition not evil, but reckless or mischievous. A man may do a thing wantonly, when he has no reason to do it, but he does it because he takes pleasure in doing it, though he knows that its consequences to others may be serious. "Gives provocation to any person" means rouses that person to anger, creates hot blood. "That such provocation will cause.....rioting," that is, it will cause a man to get angry so as to commit rioting, which he would not have otherwise committed, but such provocation must fall short of instigation constituting abetment.<sup>6</sup>

1464. Criminal Provocation of Rioting.—This section deals with a somewhat diffuse offence, which is neither abetment nor promotion of, or connivance for, rioting.<sup>7</sup> It is the provocation of a person rioting by the malignant or wanton doing of an illegal act. A person who appeals to another's sense of honour or wounded pride may or may not be guilty of an offence under this section. Suppose a man writhes under the sense of dishonour caused by the abduction of his wife, but he is afraid to avenge himself for want of assistance. His friend meets him and harps on the disgrace that had befallen him, and the retribution that it calls for. The man is provoked into hiring other men with whose assistance he commits a riot. Is his friend guilty of an offence under this section? It is evident that he is not. For though he had given him provocation, he had not done anything which is illegal and what he did was not done malignantly or wantonly.

1465. So during the excitement of the Hindu-Mahomedan riots which broke out in Bombay in 1893, the accused published a poem giving an account of the outbreak, and incidentally exalting certain classes of the Hindu community for the brave resistance which they had offered to the Mohomedan rioters. It wound up with an exhortation to the Hindus to fight again, and not be afraid of death. The accused was prosecuted and convicted under this section and s. 117 of the Code, but on appeal he was acquitted on the ground inter alia that his composition could not be regarded as an "illegal act" nor was its publication "malignant" or "wanton" within the meaning of this section.<sup>1</sup> But in another case, the accused were convicted for giving wanton provocation on the following facts. Two factions of Mahomedans started with tazias for the local Karabala. On the way they both quarrelled for precedence, and it was with the greatest difficulty that they were ultimately got to move on. They were prosecuted under this section and their conviction was upheld on revision, the Court holding that the word "wantonly" as used in the section merely meant "recklessly" and that the petitioners had acted recklessly in refusing to move on when ordered to do so, and in wrangling and abusing each other when they were all in an extreme excited condition and armed with lathies.<sup>2</sup>

1466. In order to sustain a conviction under this section, there must be (a) provocation given, (b) malignantly or wantonly, (c) by doing an illegal act, (d) intending or knowing it likely that such provocation will cause rioting. In the case last cited, the accused fulfilled all these conditions. For in abusing and refusing to move on, they had done an illegal act. Their abuses gave provocation. It was done wantonly, and it was known by them to be likely to cause rioting, because both parties were in an excited state of mind and were well armed. But the element of illegality was wanting in another case in which the accused, a Hindu, had erected a shed without any permission, inside which he had installed the image of the goddess Bhawani. A Mahomedan procession passed by his doorway outside which the goddess stood exposed to view, to which the Mahomedans objected. He was then ordered to put up a screen to hide his deity from their view, but this he refused to do, whereupon he was convicted under this section, but on revision his conviction was set aside by Oldfield, J., who held that none of the elements required to establish a case under this section was present to support the conviction.<sup>3</sup>

1467: The section requires that the accused must have done an act, and that act must have been an illegal one. It must have been, moreover, done malignantly or wantonly and with the intention or knowledge that it will probably provoke a breach of the peace. Now an act may be done wantonly, but it may not be done illegally and vice versa. Khushal Singh's act in erecting a shed and exhibiting his goddess therein, may or may not have been an illegal act. But it could not be in any sense considered a wanton act unless the Mahomedans had previously warned him of their susceptibilities in the matter, and even then there would remain the question of intention and knowledge. If five persons choose to cause provocation they cannot hold another responsible for their misbehaviour. The provocation given must be such as would be likely to cause the offence of rioting to be committed. This may depend upon the temper and feeling of the person subjected to provocation and its knowledge by the accused. The illegality of the act must be judged by the general law governing the rights of person and property. The question of malignity or wantonness is a question of fact dependent upon the circumstances of the case, and so is the question of intention or knowledge and the sufficiency of provocation to cause rioting. The accused, a Mahomedan, had killed a cow before sunrise, unobserved by the Hindus. It was held that, since the killing was neither malignantly or wantonly done, the mere fact that it might have hurt the religious susceptibilities of the Hindus, did not make the accused guilty of this offence.<sup>1</sup>

153-A. Whoever by words, either spoken or written or by signs, or by visible representations, or otherwise, promotes or attempts to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—It does not amount to an offence within the meaning of this section to point out, without malicious intention and with an honest view to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce, feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects.

1468. Analogous Law.—This section is new and was added by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act of 1898.<sup>2</sup> Its language is similar to that used in the definition of defamation in section 499 of the Code. This section has been held to be no more ancillary to the last section than section 124-A is to section 124.<sup>3</sup> The explanation appended to this section and section 124-A, affording some measure of protection to honest criticism, was contrasted with the sweeping provisions of section 4 (1) of the Press Act (since repealed),<sup>4</sup> which prescribed the penalty of forfeiture for words published "which are likely or may have a tendency, directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise" to do any of the things detailed in the six following clauses of that section.

1469. The provisions of this section may at times overlap those of s. 295-A added by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 1927.<sup>5</sup>

1470. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without the previous order or sanction of Government.<sup>6</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency or First Class Magistrate.

1471. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused wrote or spoke words or used signs or visible representation or employed other means—
- (2) To promote, or attempted to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects ;
- (3) That he did so maliciously.<sup>7</sup>

1472. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I ( name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That you—on or about the—day of—at—, by speaking (or writing) the words—(or by signs or visible representations) promoted (or attempted to promote) feelings of enmity (or hatred between (specify the classes) of His Majesty's subjects, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 153-A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1473. Principle.—This section was enacted to supplement the law of sedition, which was found to be insufficient to prevent the conflict of classes, for which it was obviously inadequate. This section may, however, be said to deal with the defamation of a class as distinguished from the defamation of a person punishable under section 500 of the Code, or s. 295-A which deals with the defamation of religion. The object of the section is to prevent the various classes from coming into conflict by mutual abuse and recrimination. It has been held to involve moral turpitude entitling the High Court to take disciplinary measure against a pleader convicted of it.<sup>1</sup>

1474. Meaning of Words.—“Promotes feelings of enmity”: The word “promotion” implies knowledge and intention to foster racial ill-feeling; the intention being an express and not merely a constructive intention.<sup>2</sup> It is not enough that one uses words calculated to produce such a feeling. What is required is that one should actively encourage such feelings by the use of words chosen for that purpose. “Hatred between classes”: Imperialism is a system and not a class, and therefore, denunciation of British Imperialism would not be punished under this section<sup>3</sup> any more than the denunciation of Capitalism, Socialism, Communism, or Communalism would be so punishable. “Feelings of enmity or hatred”: They may be unilateral or mutual; and the classes may have been already inimical. The offence consists of “promoting” or intensifying hatred, not begetting it.

1475. Promotion of Class-hatred.—The chief ingredient of an offence under this section is the intention to promote hatred or ill-will between the several classes. Such an intention must, of course, be inferred from the nature of the words used and their effect upon the class referred to as also from the state of feeling between the two communities at the time of the act complained of.<sup>4</sup> It is not necessary that the class, as a class, should be held up to hatred or contempt. The means employed is immaterial, so long as that was the intention and it is likely to produce that effect. So an attack upon the private life of a Saint or a Prophet of a community, with the object of producing it, would be punishable under this section.<sup>5</sup> Such was the case of the Punjabee newspaper, the editor of which was convicted under this section under the following circumstances. On the 8th December 1899, one Rafat Ali, a police constable, died from laceration of the brain and hæmorrhage caused by a violent blow on the back of the head, which was due to a fall from a horse. The issue of the Punjabee newspaper, dated 11th April 1906, contained two paragraphs in which it was suggested that the man died from a kick given by a European Police Superintendent and it was said not to be a solitary instance of a deliberate murder given out to be an accidental death. “How many poor Indians,” it went on to say, “have been mercilessly launched into eternity in the past, for being mistaken for bears and monkeys, or for having so-called enlarged spleens.” It was held that both the editor as well as the publisher consciously intended to promote enmity and hatred on the part of the Indians towards Europeans, by publishing the above articles, and they were, therefore, held to have come within the scope of the offence, and their case was in no way saved by the explanation appended to the section. It was also held that for the purposes of the section Englishmen and Indians constituted two separate classes.<sup>6</sup> It was also held in the same case that whether the feelings which existed between the two classes were of indifference, or of friendship, or of enmity or hatred, anything which tended to convert the two former into enmity or hatred, or to increase the enmity or hatred, promoted feelings of enmity or hatred.<sup>7</sup> The question in each case is one of fact and intention.

Where, for instance, the editor of another newspaper inveigled against both "Babus and Mehas" as robbing the poor and against the Christian Missionaries whose treatment of their converts before and after their conversion was contrasted, adding that they too were not free from the colour prejudice, the Court held the article foolish but not intended to arouse class animosity.<sup>1</sup> Similarly, a publication by the accused of a pamphlet which ridiculed the high priest of the Bohra Community exposed him to the penalty of this section.<sup>2</sup>

1476. This section is closely analogous to section 124-A, and has an intermediate place between that section and section 500 of the Code. For while section 124-A deals with what may be called defamation of the State, this section deals with defamation of a class, while section 500 refers to the defamation of a person. The defamation of a class, may, however, be made by defaming a person as an example of that class, as in the case last cited. Again, the defamation of a person may even amount to sedition, as where a person, as a representative of the ruling race is held up to ridicule or contempt, the object being to ridicule the Government through him. The question then whether a certain writing or speech amounts to sedition or an offence under this section, or is merely a personal libel, depends upon the intention of the writer or speaker as disclosed in his writing or speech. And for that purpose it is permissible to adduce the evidence of his other writings and speeches to prove or disprove his particular intention (§ 1203). If there is such evidence, the actual effect that a writing or speech did produce upon any particular class would be a question of secondary importance. For instance, there is a well-known book published on "Babu English," which holds up to ridicule and contempt the Babu class and the ridiculous mistakes they commit. It may have the effect of intensifying the estrangement between the two races, but the writer could not be convicted of an offence under this section, because he had written the book to amuse and not to beget hatred between the two classes. But the same view cannot be taken of Macaulay's portraiture of the character of the Bengalees or of Shakespeare's portraiture of the character of the Jews. To them must then be applied the rule which exempts the poet and the historian from the ordinary standard of criminal law (§ 1207). But the production of even a classic drama calculated to promote class hatred may fall within the mischief of the rule, and such was the case with "The Mikado" the staging of which was prohibited during the official visit of the Japanese fleet to Europe.

1477. A fair criticism of the character of any two classes, intended to open their eyes to their own follies, is not an offence, whatever the two classes affected may think. But such a criticism must be sincere and not malicious, calculated to do good and not produce hatred. Here again the test is the intention to be proved as in other cases.<sup>3</sup> to prevent it and, in the event of its taking place, do not use all lawful means in his or their power to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly.

1478. Analogous Law.—The duty of preventing riots is cast upon the owners and occupiers of land by the Code of Criminal Procedure.<sup>1</sup> This section makes the non-prevention of unlawful assembly and riots on their land an offence. This section proceeds upon a presumption that the owner or occupier of land allowing a riotous gathering on his land could not but be cognizant of their object, and that he was, if so minded, able to prevent it. His non-interference consequently afforded it a facility for meeting which it could not have otherwise possessed. The section obviously pre-supposes a premeditated riot and not a lawful gathering suddenly becoming unlawful and riotous.

1479. Procedure and Practice.—This is a highly penal section, and the Courts have enjoined the greatest caution before starting proceedings under it.<sup>2</sup> The offence under this section is non-cognizable and summons may issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency, or a First or a Second Class Magistrate. It may be tried summarily.

- (1) That the accused was the owner or occupier of the land ;
- (2) Upon which there was an unlawful assembly or a riot ;
- (3) That the accused (or his agent or manager) knew that it was being or had been committed, or had reason to believe that such riot had been committed;
- (4) That the accused (or his agent or manager) omitted to give the earliest notice in his power to the nearest police ;<sup>3</sup>
- (5) And moreover did not use all in his power to prevent the unlawful assembly or riot though—
- (6) He had reason to believe<sup>4</sup> that it was about to be committed and if the riot or unlawful assembly did take place, then—
- (7) He did not use all lawful means in his power to suppress or disperse the riot or unlawful assembly.

1481. Principle.—This is an instance of the extension of the doctrine of respondeat superior to criminal law. It makes the master criminally liable for the act or omission of his servant of the nature specified in the section. His liability does not depend upon his knowledge of the riot or of the acts and intention of this agent.<sup>5</sup> Owners and occupiers of land have been invested by law with certain duties of the police, which they are expected to discharge by virtue of their position as landholders. They are not unconnected with the use of land, and their responsibility is declared upon the assumption that as landholders they possess the power of preventing the gathering of men upon their land, and to suppress or disperse disorderly gatherings if they are so minded. The section was never intended to punish the owner of land for any riot committed upon it. It was merely intended to punish the owner who or whose agent or manager does any of the things specified in the section. (§ 1478).

1482. Meaning of Words.—“ Any person claiming an interest ” : The words “ interest ” here apparently means any right in the land as a mortgagee, lessee, remainderman or a reversioner. It would not include a person having a mere charge or a license, or a right in the nature of an easement. Persons jointly interested in the land, e.g., co-widows, would be both liable.<sup>6</sup> “ His agent or manager ” means one in actual charge of the management. “ All lawful means in his power ” : He is not therefore entitled to shoot down every one so found upon his land.

1483. Criminal Non-feasance of Landholders.—Three classes of persons are responsible under this section : (a) Owner, (b) occupier, (c) persons having or claiming an interest in land upon which an unlawful assembly or a riot takes place. These classes are wide enough to include almost any person, whatever may be his connection with or right to the land. But this is scarcely what the section was intended to lay down. For instance, a non-resident partner or co-sharer, who had taken no active part in the management of the estate, could not be held responsible for not complying with the directions of the section.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, a person in occupation of the land could not claim exemption on the ground that he was merely a squatter, and had no right to it. The section requires that if a person is a de facto owner or occupier of land, he is charged with the duty of preventing unlawful and riotous assemblies, though he may be found to possess no title to the land. The same duty is cast upon persons who are in subordinate charge of land, such as lessees and mortgagees in possession. So where a land is owned by one, and is in the occupation of another, both are jointly and severally liable, and the same liability attaches to those who have, or even claim an interest in such land. But such claim must, it is apprehended, be something more than a bare assertion of a right. It must be a claim supported by at least some show of title.

1484. Now in order to establish an offence under this section, it is necessary to prove (i) that there was an unlawful assembly, or a riot took place, (ii) that the accused is the owner, or occupier of, or interested in, the land, (iii) that either he or his agent or manager knew that the riot was about to take place, (iv) that knowing this neither he nor the agent nor the manager used all lawful means to prevent or suppress the riot, and (v) that he did not give the earliest notice to the police.<sup>2</sup> Knowledge of the landholder, or of his agent, is therefore the first essential element of an offence under this section. After knowledge, comes his duty to prevent or suppress the riot. Now a person could not be held liable for an offence under this section, unless it is shown that he had failed to do what he could have reasonably done. For instance, an owner or occupier of land on which an unlawful assembly is held cannot be convicted under this section unless there is a finding that the riot was premeditated.<sup>3</sup> But if it was premeditated, it is then immaterial that he did not come to know about it, or that the land was managed by his agent or manager who had kept him in ignorance of it.

riot had been committed upon his threshing floor though the registered owner of it was his brother and the riot did not relate to the threshing floor at all.<sup>1</sup>

1486. It will be observed that the section prescribes a penalty for three breaches of duty, namely; (a) omission to give notice; (b) abstention from preventing; and (c) negligence to suppress an unlawful assembly or a riot. In other words, it is the duty of landholders to prevent a riot before it is committed, and to suppress it after it is committed, and in any case to give the earliest notice to the police. The question whether the notice was the earliest possible depends upon the information possessed by the landholder or his agent. So again the power to prevent and suppress a riot threatened or committed depends upon the influence he possesses and the means at his disposal. But when a person is charged for not doing his best, it is for the prosecution to show what he could have done, which he had failed to do. So Norman, J., in one case observed: "It may be that Babu Rakhal Das Roy might have used his influence with the ryots of the Paul party, and by that influence might have induced them to disperse and cease from rioting. But there is nothing to show that he had any such influence, and could have induced them to disperse, or that he wilfully kept out of the way, leaving the riots to take its own course. If we allowed the conviction to stand, it would be on some bare conjecture that he might have had some means of dispersing the riot, of which there is no evidence."<sup>2</sup> As Stanley, J., added in a case under this section "where entrusted to the Magistrates, the Court must always act upon proof and not on mere surmises."<sup>3</sup> Such proof must be given in a case instituted and in the presence of the accused tried under this section. The records of the rioting case are wholly inadmissible to convict them for an offence under this section.<sup>4</sup> Prosecutions under this and the following sections should be instituted without delay, having regard to the object of the law laid down in these sections, which is to impress upon landholders, their responsibilities and obligations in respect of riots and unlawful assemblies, committed under circumstances mentioned in those sections, and thus serve as a wholesome warning not only to persons concerned but to others.

155. Whenever a riot is committed for the benefit or on behalf of any person who is the owner or occupier of any land respecting which such riot takes place or who claims any interest in such land, or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot, or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom, such person shall be punishable with fine, if he or his agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed, or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed was likely to be held, shall not respectively use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent such assembly or riot from taking place, and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

1487. Analogous Law.—This section is the same as the last with the aggravating circumstances superadded, that the riot was committed for the person's benefit. This is reflected in the unlimited fine that the section provides as the penalty for the offence. In two minor points this section must, however, be distinguished from the last. That section is more general, and punishes a non-feasance not only in connection with the riot, but also in connection with an unlawful assembly. This section refers only to a riot, and an offence under this section is not complete until a riot is actually committed. As regards the persons, those liable under this section are larger than those held liable under the last section. For while under the latter section in order that a person may be criminally liable, it is necessary that he should at least have claimed an interest in the land. Under this section, however, a person who has derived any benefit from the riot or who was a party to any dispute whether or not connected with the land which gave rise to the riot is equally liable. The object of the last section, this, and the next section is the same. They are directed to the punishing of persons to whom the origin of the most agrarian riots may be remotely traced.

- (1) That a riot was committed, which must be proved independently in the case, the record of the riot case being excluded from evidence ;<sup>1</sup>
- (2) That it took place with respect to some land, or that it arose out of some dispute ;
- (3) That the accused was the owner or occupier of such land, or claimed an interest therein, or claimed some interest in the subject of such dispute ;<sup>2</sup>
- (4) That the riot was committed for the benefit, or on behalf of the accused, or that the accused accepted or derived some benefit therefrom ;
- (5) That the accused or his agent or manager had reason to believe—
  - (a) that such riot was likely to be committed, or
  - (b) that the unlawful assembly which committed such riot, was likely to be held ;
- (6) That the accused, his agent or manager did not respectively use all lawful means possible—
  - (a) to prevent the unlawful assembly or riot from taking place, or
  - (b) for suppressing and dispersing the same.

1489. Limits of Liability.—This section is generally worded but it is manifestly directed against persons who encourage or connive at a riot, and who, at any rate, consider it as to their advantage. This presupposes at least a reasonable belief into its imminence, and that belief is by the express words of the section made essential to charge a man with criminal liability, and it must be established by the prosecution.<sup>3</sup> The fact that the riot was sudden and unpremeditated, and such as there was no reason to infer the accused could have anticipated, or thought likely to happen, would be sufficient for his exoneration, though it may have been to his interest or benefit.<sup>4</sup> So, where there is no evidence to show that an absentee co-sharer in a zaminadari takes an active part in the management, he could not be convicted under this section, after a resident co-sharer has been so convicted.<sup>5</sup> As before observed, the provisions of these sections are so general that they require a strict construction.

the agent or manager of such person shall be punishable with fine, if such agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed, or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed was likely to be held, shall not use all lawful means in his power to prevent such riot or assembly from taking place and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

1490. Analogous Law.—This section merely extends the provisions of the last section to the agent or manager. The language of the two sections is in other respects the same.

1490-A. Procedure.—Same as under s. 155, see § 1488.

1491. Limits of Vicarious Liability.—These sections confer on the Magistracy powers of startling magnitude, so that, as observed by Pigot, J., “it is incumbent upon those entrusted with the exercise of such powers to act not upon inference or suspicions, but upon evidence, not upon surmise but upon proof.”<sup>1</sup> So where certain servants of an indigo factory of which the accused Brae was the manager, went armed with lathis and one of them with a gun, to the lands of which lawful possession had been delivered to same tenants, against the factory of which Brae was the manager, and a riot occurred in which one of the tenants was shot dead by one of the factory men, and Brae was thereupon prosecuted under this section and it was proved against him that on the morning of the day of the riot at 7 a.m., he had been seen riding in the direction of the lands in dispute, that later on in the morning and before the hour of the riot at 10-30 a.m., or 11 a. m., he had passed close to, and inspected the indigo growing on them. Brae was in the factory when the riot took place, but took no steps to prevent it. He was convicted by the Magistrate, but this conviction was quashed on appeal by the High Court, who held that, thus one Brae could not be convicted because the facts proved created a suspicion, but not proof of what was essentially necessary to constitute an offence under this section namely, (i) that a riot was committed; (ii) that the riot, if committed, was committed for the benefit of the accused and (iii) that the accused had reason to believe that a riot was likely to be committed.<sup>2</sup>

157. Whoever harbours, receives or assembles in any house or premises in his occupation or charge or under his control, any persons, knowing that such persons have been hired, engaged or employed, or are about to be hired, engaged or employed, to join or become members of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

1492. Analogous Law.—This section as compared with s. 150 is of a wider application. The latter section dealt with the hiring of promotion of, or connivance at, the hiring of persons to join an unlawful assembly.

1493. This section deals with the harbouring of the persons, so or otherwise hired. Under English Law one who harbours persons riotously inclined is punishable as an accessory. But this section is wider, inasmuch as it makes it an offence to receive persons before they have brought themselves within the pale of criminal law. Persons about to join an unlawful assembly may not be guilty of any offence, but a person who harbours or receives them is guilty of an offence under this section.

1494. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, but summons must issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency, First or Second Class Magistrate and may be tried summarily.

- (1) That certain persons had been or were about to be hired, engaged or employed, to join or become members of an unlawful assembly;<sup>3</sup>
- (2) That the accused harboured, received or assembled them, in any house or premises under his control;
- (3) That he then knew that the persons were as in (1) above.

1496. Meaning of Words.—“Harbours receives or assembles”: For the meaning of the word harbour, see §§ 1298, 1302. The words “receive or assemble” are more extensive than the word “harbour,” which means to give shelter. The words receive implies the physical act of receiving without intending to give shelter, while assembling may mean either marshalling or collecting in a body. “Or under his control,” so that he has access to it. A house let is in the control of the lessee and not of the owner. The words imply any right even a license as gives access to the house or premises. “Or are about to be hired, etc”:

(1) Brae, 10 C. 338 (341).

(2) Brae, 10 C. 338 (341).

(3) Samuel Aaron, (1931) M. 440; Radharaman Saha, 58 C. 1401.

These words if not properly understood, may create a difficulty. They do not refer to a remote contingency of the men being hired, but rather to the imminence of an unlawful assembly for which the men had been bespoken.

1497. What Harboursing is Prohibited.—This section makes the “hiring, receiving and assembling” of certain persons an offence. The harbouring of persons who have already been employed to join or become members of an unlawful assembly presents no difficulty, for in such a case all that the prosecution has to establish is that (a) the men had been so hired, (b) that the accused knew it, and (c) that he harboured, received or assembled them. As to the last, the term “harbouring” is again a term well understood, the significance of which has been explained in another connection §§ 1298, 1302. It implies that the men were specially engaged to commit a riot, and that the accused had, as such, given them shelter. Where, therefore, the accused had taken in his service men from a district where men have a well-known character as lathials, and a riot subsequently took place, the accused could not be convicted under this section for harbouring men about to join an unlawful assembly.<sup>1</sup> But what is “receiving or assembling”? The word “assembles” may mean either marshalling or merely collecting. A person may, for example, assemble his forces at certain points of vantage with a view to use them to the best advantage, or he may merely collect them in one place before starting them upon their unlawful mission. If the men then knew the object of their meeting they would themselves be members of an unlawful assembly. If they did not, they might be innocent, but even then the person who assembles them may be guilty under this section if he knew that they had been foregathered for an unlawful purpose. Again, a confederate may send a batch of men to another at a distance, and the latter may depute some one to receive them, or show them the way. If he knew of the purpose for which the men had been indented for, he is guilty of this offence, though he may have taken no further part in the matter. But this is an extreme case. Ordinarily, a person is said to receive another, if he welcomes him, and renders him some assistance in finding food and shelter. He who gives him food and shelter “harbours” him, if he knew of the illegal purpose for which the men had come, otherwise he is not liable.

1499. The avenues of knowledge are many. It may be gained as much from the casual conversations of those interested in the approaching conflict, as from the attitude and demeanour of the hirelings; as much from the preparations made, and the precautions taken as from the plans discussed and the views expressed by those interested in the raid or contest. Such contest must be imminent and not remote, probable and not merely contingent. For instance, persons may discuss plans against a contingency which might never happen. They may have no present intention of committing a riot and no intention at all unless they are driven to it by the force of circumstances. In such a case, it would be stretching the language of the section too far to say that the men were about to be hired or employed to become members of an unlawful assembly.<sup>2</sup> So, where the Magistrate found that the accused had collected and harboured men for the purpose of committing a riot should he find it to his interest to do so, the High Court set aside his conviction, holding that as the section “contemplated the imminence of an unlawful assembly, and the proof of facts which in law would go to constitute an unlawful assembly,” the accused could not be convicted for what was a mere preparation against a possible contingency.<sup>3</sup> The fact that the same persons had formed an unlawful assembly may be some evidence of their intention, but it is no ground for a proceeding under this section.<sup>4</sup>

158. Whoever is engaged or hired, or offers or attempts to be hired or engaged, to do or assist in doing any of the acts specified in section 141 shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both, and whoever, being so engaged or hired as aforesaid, goes armed, or engages or offers to go armed, with any deadly weapon or with anything which used as a weapon of offence is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

1500. Analogous Law.—This is the last of the set of sections dealing with the offence of rioting, and it makes it penal to hire oneself out to assist in an unlawful assembly or rioting. The section is divided into two parts, and the punishments prescribed in each depends upon the weapons possessed by the hireling—and for an obvious reason. For a person who goes armed with a deadly weapon, naturally strikes greater terror into the minds of people than one who is unarmed.

1501. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, but summons should issue in the first instance, unless the offence falls under the second clause in which case a warrant should so issue. But it is in either case bailable, though not compoundable, and it may be tried by a Presidency, First or Second Class Magistrate, and is triable summarily.

1502. Proof.—The points requiring proof under this section are:—

- (1) That the accused offered or attempted to be hired or engaged ; or was in fact hired or engaged ;
- (2) That the object of it was to assist in doing any of the five acts provided under s. 141 ;
- (3) That the accused offered to go armed or went with a deadly weapon.

1503. Being Hired for Unlawful Purpose.—This section completes the catena of cases in which law seeks to bar out rioters by penalizing their aiders and abettors, employers and supporters. It cuts the ground from under their feet by penalizing those who allow or suffer an unlawful assembly or a riot to take place on their land, or from which they in any way gain an advantage. It punishes those who hire and those who harbour mercenaries for the purpose, and the latter are themselves punishable under this section.

1504. As to these last, the section looks upon them with varying gravity according to the nature of the arms borne by them. If they were not armed with lethal weapons, they are not visited with punishment of the same gravity as when they make themselves formidable by the possession of those weapons.

1505. The section speaks of (a) an offer, (b) an attempt, and (c) an engagement to assist in the doing of an unlawful act. A person who merely purposes to assist, would thus bring himself within the penalty of the section, though his proposal may have been promptly refused. Law regards an offer made as a facility given to a person to riot, which it is its object to discourage. It therefore visits those who offer and those who join with the same punishment. A person who “attempts” to be so hired or employed is similarly treated. An attempt in this sense is only an offer carried a step higher.

1506. It has already been seen as to what constitutes a deadly weapon, so as to aggravate the crime (§ 1362).

159. When two or more persons, by fighting in a public place, disturb the public peace, they are said to “commit an affray.”

1507. Analogous Law.—This definition of affray<sup>1</sup> corresponds with its definition in English Law. “Affrays,” says Blackstone, “are the fighting of two or more persons in some public place, to the terror of His Majesty's subjects; for, if the fighting be in private, it is no affray but an assault."<sup>1</sup> The gist of the offence consists in the terror it causes to the public. There can be no affray in a "private place." It may be an assault or something more, but it is not an affray. An affray is an offence against the public peace because it is committed in a public place and is likely to cause general alarm and disturbance. No quarrelsome or threatening language whatsoever will amount to an affray.<sup>2</sup> But if the language used be such as to amount to an assault, it may become an affray if it is committed in a public place. And if it involves five or more persons it may amount to a riot, if it was premeditated, otherwise it is still an affray irrespective of the number. An affray differs from a riot inasmuch as it cannot be committed in a private place and does not require five or more persons, and is sudden and not premeditated.<sup>3</sup>

(1) French “affraier” meaning terrify.

1508. What is a Public Place.—A public place is a place where the public go, no matter whether they have a right to go or not. If the public resort to a place without let or hindrance it is a public place, though, strictly speaking, they may be trespassing.<sup>4</sup> Many shows are exhibited to the public on private property, yet they are frequented by the public—the public go there.<sup>5</sup> There are some places which are by their very nature public, others which are public and private at times. An omnibus,<sup>6</sup> a public urinal,<sup>7</sup> a market, a public street, a public ferry, a passenger train, and a goods yard of railway station<sup>8</sup> are instances of the former. A public garden is not necessarily a public place at all hours, but only when it is open to the public, and so a railway station and platform is only public when a passenger train is expected, it is not a public place at other times, and not even when a goods train is expected.<sup>9</sup> So a goods train is not a public place, for the public do not travel by it. A private garden is not a public place, though the public may have an access to it at times.<sup>10</sup> A Court of law, a Church, mosque or a temple<sup>11</sup> are similarly public places during the hours the public have access to them. So are a hospital, a Town Hall, a theatre or other place of amusement. A Caravan Serai is however by its nature always public, and so would be hotel, a Dak bungalow and other places intended for the reception of travellers. But a boarding house is not a public place, for it is not open to the public, though some of the public may avail themselves of it. A public house is only public during open hours, after which it is private, and so would be a grog shop in this country. A school or college is not a public place, because the public do not go there, and the fact that the public are permitted to pass through it for convenience does not make any difference. There is a distinction between an act done in public, and an act done in a public place. In England, some statutes make acts penal which are done in public, others make acts penal which are done in a public place, so that in the criminal statute law in England the distinction is, it will be observed, between doing an act in public, and doing an act in a public place.<sup>12</sup> The same distinction is observable in the Acts of Indian Legislature. The offence here contemplated must be committed in a public place, and in the presence of the public without whom there can be no breach of the public peace. A private chabutra adjoining a public thoroughfare may be public, because it is exposed to public view, but it is not a public place unless the public had a right of access, or were used or permitted to have access to it.<sup>13</sup>

1509. In order to constitute an affray, there must be not only fighting, but it must cause disturbance of the public peace.<sup>14</sup> The familiar example of this is a drunken brawl in a public street where two or more persons shout at and pull about one another. The fighting here spoken of means a quarrel accompanied by some use of some little force. For if the force used is considerable, the offence may be criminal assault or hurt and not merely affray, which is an offence of the nature of disorderly behaviour in public. But mere abuse and the use of threatening language, however violent, is not affray.

160. Whoever commits an affray, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees, or with both.

1510. Analogous Law.—This section lays down the penalty for the offence described in the last section. Affray is an offence allied to riotous or disorderly behaviour in public for which the Police Act empowers any police-officer to take into custody, without a warrant, any person who within his view commits the offence.<sup>1</sup>

1511. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but it may be cognizable if it amounts also to an offence under section 34 of the Police Act. In either case summons must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and may be tried by any Magistrate, and is triable summarily.

- (1) That the accused and another person or other persons were fighting ;
- (2) That such fight was in a public place ;
- (3) That the fight disturbed the public peace.

1513. The evidence required to establish an affray is (a) that there was a fight, (b) that it was in a public place, and that (c) it led to the breach of the public peace. Of course where a large number of persons commit an affray, specific evidence as to the acts of each fighter cannot be expected ; but only general evidence as to the accused taking part in it. So where two parties fought over their right to fish in a bhil, it was held that the men who punted the boats on which the fight took place, and in whose interests the fight on the boats took place were just as guilty as those who actually struck the blows.<sup>2</sup>

“ I (name and office of Magistrate etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows :—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—, committed offence of affray, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 160 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

1515. Characteristics of an Affray.—The general characteristics of an affray have been before set out (§§ 1507-1508). An affray should, on the one hand, be distinguished from an assault. On the other it must be distinguished from a riot. It differs from the latter in that it is unpremeditated and sudden, and does not require five or more persons, and from both in that it is committed in a public place (§ 1508). Ordinarily an affray is a sudden quarrel between two or more persons resulting in fighting and a breach of the peace. But it may become aggravated either from the nature or character of the place where and the person against whom it is committed. For example, an affray committed in the Courts of justice or within their precincts, receives an aggravation from the fact that it implies defiance of the law,<sup>3</sup> and want of respect to the Courts. And for the same reason affrays in a church or churchyard have always been esteemed very heinous offences, as being very great indignities to the Divine Majesty, to whose worship and service such places are immediately dedicated.<sup>1</sup> So as regards persons, an affray may receive an aggravation from the persons against whom it is committed, as where the offences of justice are violently disturbed in the due execution of their office, by the rescue of a person legally arrested, or by the bare attempt to make such a rescue.<sup>2</sup>

1516. It has been before remarked that an affray differs from a riot in that it is unpremeditated, being a sudden quarrel in which the people act on the impulse of the moment. So if a number of persons meeting together at a fair or market “happen, on a sudden quarrel, to fall together by the ears, it seems agreed that they will not be guilty of a riot but only of a sudden affray, of which none are guilty but those actually engaged in it; and this on the ground of the design of their meeting being innocent and lawful and the subsequent breach of the peace happening unexpectedly and without any previous intention.”<sup>3</sup> Bayley, J., considered this view untenable in view of the law enacted in section 141 under which an assembly which was not unlawful when it assembled may subsequently become an unlawful assembly.<sup>4</sup> But this observation was evidently made with reference to the facts of the particular case before him, and it cannot be laid down as a general rule that whenever five or more persons quarrel they are, apart from the other facts, necessarily members of an unlawful assembly. Of course, an affray may become an unlawful assembly if it acquires the requisite attributes, but a sudden unpremeditated quarrel leading to blows can scarcely be so designated.

1517. There can be no affray unless there is fighting, and that fighting causes a disturbance of the public peace. So where an Assistant Station Master and a railway pay office peon fought on a railway platform when a goods train was in the station, and the Magistrate convicted them holding that the peace of the guard and the engine-driver of the goods train had been interfered with, it was held that there being no disturbance of the public peace, there was no affray, and that the case was one of an ordinary assault.<sup>5</sup>

OF OFFENCES BY OR RELATING TO PUBLIC SERVANTS.

1518. Topical Introduction.—As this chapter is intended to reach offences which are committed by public servants, and are of such a description that they can be committed by public servants alone, so the next chapter (chapter X) deals with the contempt of the lawful authority of the public servants in its various forms which can only be committed by members of the public in relation to such public servants. As this chapter is intended to ensure probity among the public servants, the next chapter creates certain obligations on the part of the public to assist public servants in the discharge of their duty. It must not be understood that this chapter is an exhaustive Code for the public servants, since the State can make rules for the conduct of its own servants, though it cannot regulate the morality of the public at large, beyond that implied in the enactment of this Code. Misconduct and abuse of their power by persons other than public servants have to be left to be otherwise dealt with by the penal visitation of a criminal Code.

1519. Those offences which are common between public servants and other members of the community, are left to the general provisions of the Code. If a public servant embezzles public money, he is left to the ordinary law of criminal breach of trust. If he falsely pretends to have disbursed money for the public, and by this deception induces the Government to allow it in his accounts he is left to the ordinary law of cheating. If he produces forged vouchers to back his statement he is left to the ordinary law of forgery. There is no reason to punish these offences more severely when the Government suffers by them than when private people suffer. Since the security of Government lies in the purity of its administration, without which it would lose both revenue and prestige.<sup>2</sup>

1520. This chapter does not provide punishments for all kinds of misconduct of public servants, and this the authors were not unaware of. They also admitted that the punishments enacted in this chapter are not generally proportioned, either to the evil which the abuse of power produces, or to the depravity of a man who, having been entrusted with power for the public benefit, employs that power to gratify his own cupidity or revenge. But the penalty of an offence committed by a public functionary in the exercise of his public functions has been fixed on the supposition that it will often be only a part, and a small part of the penalty which he will suffer. It is in the power of the Government to punish him for many acts which the law has not made punishable. "It is in the power of the Government to add to any sentence pronounced by the Courts, another sentence which will often be even more terrible." Such a sentence may consist of degradation or dismissal, the infliction of which must be left to the executive Government which may be trusted to suppress and punish corruption and oppression.

1521. This chapter makes the receiving of a bribe an offence while another punishes the giver as an abettor.<sup>3</sup> The authors did not, however, consider this course advisable, being of opinion that, in many cases, the receiver is the tempter and the giver has no option. In other words, bribes in this country partake of the nature of extortion.<sup>4</sup> But the Legislature has followed the normal law, and has made, both the giver and the receiver, criminally liable. Besides the normal cases of bribes, public servants are prohibited from using their office to benefit themselves in more indirect ways. The authors of the Code instanced two such cases, viz., a deposit made with a private banker who pays a heavy rate of

For the purposes of this Chapter every Railway servant shall be deemed to be a public servant—see Indian Railways Act, 1890 (IX of 1890) s. 137. Every manager or servant of the Court of Wards under the Bombay Court of Wards Act, 1905, shall be deemed to be a public servant within the meaning of this Chapter—Bom. Act 1 of 1925, s. 1 (2) Bom. Code; see also the Central Provinces Courts of Wards Act, 1899 (XXIV of 1899), s. 19 (2), C. P. Code; the Ajmer Government Wards Regulation, 1855 (1 of 1855) s. 11 (2) Aj. Code.

interest, and a house taken on low rent and furnished with costly furniture. Illegal gratifications may take other forms, which may be penalized by the promulgation of rules for the conduct of public servants made under s. 166. Cases not covered by that section would, the authors hoped, be dealt with by the executive Government.<sup>1</sup>

161. Whoever, being or expecting to be a public servant, accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gratification whatever, other than legal remuneration, as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do any official act, or for showing or forbearing to show, in the exercise of his official functions, favour or disfavour to any person, or for rendering or attempting to render any service or disservice to any person with the Legislative or Executive Government of India, or with the Government of any Presidency or with any Lieutenant-Governor, or with any public servant, as such shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanations.—“Expecting to be a public servant”: If a person not expecting to be in office obtains a gratification by deceiving others into a belief that he is about to be in the office, and that he will then serve them, he may be guilty of cheating, but he is not guilty of the offence defined in this section.

“Gratification”: The word “gratification” is not restricted to pecuniary gratifications, or to gratifications estimable in money.

“Legal remuneration”: The words “legal remuneration” are not restricted to remuneration which a public servant can lawfully demand, but include all remuneration which he is permitted by the Government,<sup>2</sup> which he serves, to accept.

“A motive or reward for doing”: A person who receives a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done, comes within these words.

Illustrations.

(a) A, a munsif, obtains from Z, a banker, a situation in Z's bank for A's brother, as a reward to A for deciding a case in favour of Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A, holding the office of Resident at the Court of a subsidiary Power, accepts a lakh of rupees from the Minister of that Power. It does not appear that A accepted this sum as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do any particular official act, or for rendering or attempting to render any particular service to that Power with the British Government. But it does appear that A accepted the sum as a motive or reward for generally showing favour in the exercise of his official functions to that Power. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(c) A, a public servant, induces Z, erroneously to believe that A's influence with the Government has obtained a title for Z, and thus induces Z to give A money as a reward for this service. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

1522. Analogous Law.—In England bribery is a misdemeanour punishable at common law. Bribery in strict sense, says Hawkins, is taken for a great misprision of one in a judicial place, taking any valuable thing, except meat and drink of small value of any man who has to do before him in any way, for doing his office, or by colour of his office. In a large sense, it is taken for the receiving or offering of any undue reward by or to any person whomsoever, whose ordinary profession or business relates to the administration of justice, in order to incline him to do a thing against the known rules of honesty and integrity. Also, bribery sometimes signifies the taking or giving a reward for offices of a public nature.<sup>1</sup>

1523. The same rule has been enacted by the statutes. With regard to the Judges the rule is thus enacted : “ Ye take not by yourself or by other privily nor apertly, gift nor reward of gold or silver, nor of any other thing which may turn to your profit, unless it be meat or drink, and that of small value, of any man that shall have any plea or process hanging before you, as long as the same process shall be so hanging ; nor after for the same cause.”<sup>2</sup> This form was embodied in the oath taken by the Judges on their appointment, and it was the oath which the Bengal Regulation also introduced into this country in the case of the Company's Judges.<sup>3</sup>

1524. In other cases, bribery has been provided against by specific statutes passed “ for the effectual prevention and punishment of bribery and corruption of and by members, officers or servants of corporations, councils, boards, commissions, and other public bodies.”<sup>4</sup> So the Corrupt Practises Prevention Act<sup>5</sup> enacts elaborate rules directed to the prevention of bribery and corruption at parliamentary elections, and another Act extends similar rules to municipal elections.<sup>6</sup> All these, are however, extensions of the same principle, which is enunciated in this section, and which with some verbal variations underlies all statutes directed against the same abuse.

1525. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session or a Presidency or First Class Magistrate. The sanction of Government is moreover necessary for the prosecution of Judges and public servants not removable from their office without the sanction of Government.<sup>7</sup>

1526. An aggravated form of this offence is made punishable by section 214, and where if the fact stated in that section are proved, the proper procedure is to proceed under that, and not this section.

1527. Proof.—For a charge of bribery against a public servant the evidence should, it is said, be conclusive<sup>8</sup> but the evidence of the bribe-giver, corroborated by that of one from whom he had raised money for the purpose, was held to be sufficient.<sup>9</sup> And in one case the court accepted the uncorroborated testimony of two accomplices as sufficient, as they were shown to bear no animus against the accused.<sup>10</sup> The giver completes his abetment so soon as the bribe offered by him is accepted though the briber did not accept it as a bribe but merely as evidence of the giver's guilt.<sup>11</sup> The fact that the complaint is lodged under this section does not prevent the court from convicting under another section, e.g., 171-E provided that the accused is not misled by the charge.<sup>1</sup> The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused at the time of the offence was, or expected to be, a public servant.<sup>2</sup>
- (2) That he accepted or retained, or agreed to accept, or attempted to obtain from some person a gratification.
- (3) That such gratification was not a legal remuneration due to him.
- (4) That he accepted such gratification as a motive or reward, proof of which is essential,<sup>3</sup> for—
  - (a) doing or forbearing to do an official act, or
  - (b) showing or forbearing to show favour or disfavour to someone in the exercise of his official functions, or
  - (c) rendering or attempting to render any service<sup>4</sup> or disservice to some one, with the Legislative or executive Government, or with any public servant.

1528. Charge.—The charge under this section should specify the nature of the office held by the accused, by virtue of which he was a public servant, and the name of the person from whom the bribe was taken,<sup>5</sup> and of the public servant who had to be influenced in the exercise of his official functions.<sup>6</sup> Again, the accused cannot be tried at one trial or more than three offences committed within the space of one year. Consequently, where a bribe was collected from certain inhabitants of a village by subscription, and handed over to the recipient in a lump sum, the latter could not be charged under this section with the receipt of the whole sum so collected, but only in respect of any three separate items constituting the total collection.<sup>7</sup> But where in pursuance of the same purpose the bribe is paid in two instalments on two different days, the offence committed is one, and there cannot be two convictions on account of two separate payments.<sup>8</sup>

1529. The charge should be thus worded :—

“ That you—being a public servant in the—Department directed, accepted from—[(state the name of the giver) if received for another, add for another party, namely,—] a gratification other than legal remuneration, as a motive for forbearing to do an official act, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 161 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or of the Court of Session or High Court).

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried (in case of committal by the said Court) on the said charge.”<sup>9</sup>

1530. Principle.—The giving and taking of bribes, as a crime, is an outcome of refined jurisprudence. In crude early age the payment of the Judge by the parties was a matter of course. Its abuse was sale of justice to the highest bidder. Thus payment led to corruption and corruption to the notion that it was the concern of the State to pay its Judges, and the duty of the Judge was to decide in accordance with the light of his conscience and not in accordance with the magnitude of his reward. And as the placing of man in a position in which his interest clashes with his duty leads to the subordination of duty to self-interest, law began to reprobate the practice of allowing Judges to receiving any payment from the parties or to hold any communion with them. With the elevation of morality the attainment of this end was an easy task, for Judges become as anxious to preserve themselves from the blemish of being considered partial, as the public were concerned in seeing them dispense even handed justice uninfluenced by fear or favour. Hence the peculiar privileges and liabilities of Judges.

1531. Meaning of Words.—“ Being a public servant,” a public servant remains a public servant, so long as he can legally exercise the power.<sup>10</sup>

“Expecting to be a public servant” : A mere hope not ending in fruition will not do.<sup>1</sup> The expectation must be realized, and in practice the recipient must have acted officially in the corrupt manner previously promised,<sup>2</sup> though this is not necessary to complete the crime. “For doing or forbearing to do”. A public servant arrogating to himself a power which he does not possess, for the exercise of which he receives bribes is liable to conviction under this section, since the language of the section is wide enough to cover such a case, as is clear from illustration, (c) appended to this section.<sup>3</sup> “Or attempt to obtain” : A mere asking is sufficient to constitute such an attempt.<sup>4</sup> “A motive or reward for doing any official act” : This does not mean that if the bribe-taker receives a bribe from a person not as a motive or reward for judging in his favour, but for judging rightly he would not be guilty. But it would seem that a thanks-offering is not a bribe<sup>5</sup> though it would be punishable under s. 165. But a reward by the patient to a doctor for keeping him longer in the hospital, after the latter had decided to discharge him is a bribe.<sup>6</sup> “Gratification estimable in money” : Such may be the case where two officials exchange favours, or where one has sexual intercourse in return for an official favour.

1532. What amounts to a Bribe.—Three things are requisite to constitute the offence of bribery here described : (i) the receiver must be a present or prospective public servant, (ii) he must solicit or receive an illegal gratification, and (iii) it must have been received as a motive or reward for doing any official act which he was empowered to do, otherwise, it is extortion.<sup>7</sup> The section deals only with persons who are or expect to be public servants. It has no reference to any other person ; whatever may have been their inequity in selling their favours to persons similarly circumstanced. This chapter had been enacted to insure honesty on the part of public servants. Law cannot regulate the morality of all its subjects. Such a task is as much beyond its scope, as it is impossible (§ 1528). It, therefore, extends its prohibition only to two classes of persons, (a) those who are actually public servants, (b) those who expect to be so.

1533. The first question must be answered with reference to what has been said in under section 21 (§§ 131-169). As according to that definition not only persons properly designated public servants, but also persons, being to all appearance public servants, are entitled to the rights and are subject to the liabilities of public servants, persons who are de facto public servants may be convicted under this section, whatever defect there may have been in their appointment. In other words whenever, a person has received a bribe professing to act as a public servant, he could not afterwards turn round and plead the illegality of his appointment as a defence to his criminality.<sup>8</sup> A goods clerk employed by a Railway administration is a railway servant, within the meaning of s. 3 (6) of the Railways Act, 1890, and he is under s. 137 of the said Act also a public servant for the purposes of offences under this chapter. Railway servants properly, as long as they do not cease to be such, continue to be “public servants” for the purposes of this chapter, whatever functions they may be temporarily discharging at the time when the offence by, or in respect of, them is committed.<sup>9</sup>

1534. The second question calls for notice. What is meant by a person expecting to be a public servant ? Now a person may “expect” to be a public servant, and in the hope of that expectation coming true, he may ask or receive a bribe. Now his expectation may have been well-founded though it may or may not be realized ; or it may be merely a fraud to inveigle another. If it is realized and the person becomes a public servant, he may or may not bestow the favour, which he had promised and was paid for. It is clear from the explanation appended to the section that if he did not himself believe that he was to be a public servant, but led others to believe that he was to be so appointed and who thereupon paid him money, he could not be convicted under this section, though he may then be, probably will be, guilty of cheating under section 420. Eliminating then this case from our present consideration there still remain two cases in which a person bona fide expects to be a public servant, but in which he is disappointed, or becoming a public servant he disappoints the briber by not doing what he had promised to do. In either case it seems to be clear that he is liable under this section, in the former case because, as the Law Commissioners explained it, that if "a person expecting to be appointed to a public office obtains money from another as the price of favour to be shown to that other, in the exercise of his functions in that office, he is surely as corrupt as one who does the same, being actually in office. It must be proved, of course, that he gave the other party reason to believe that he was about to obtain the office; it must be proved, also, as appears by the first 'explanation,' that he himself expected to obtain it. In practice, the provision would probably be brought into action only against persons who, after having obtained the expected office, are found guilty of the previous corrupt transaction, and generally only against persons, who, having obtained the expected office, have acted officially in the corrupt manner previously promised."<sup>1</sup> But as a matter of law, it is clear that not only a person who is but also one who expected to be a public servant may be guilty of an offence under this section.

1535. What is Gratification.—Secondly, the person must have received "any gratification" as a "motive or reward" for doing any official act. The word "gratification" is not defined in the section or the Code, but its sense is extended by the explanation, which says that the word "is not restricted to pecuniary gratification, or to gratification estimable in money". The word "gratification" is thus used in its larger sense as connoting anything, which affords gratification or satisfaction or pleasure to the taste, appetite or the mind. Money is, of course, one source of affording pleasure, inasmuch as it implies command over things which afford pleasure, but there are various other objects which afford gratification. The satisfaction of one's desires, whether of body or of mind, is a gratification in the true sense of the term. The craving for an honorary distinction, or for sexual intercourse is an example of mental and bodily desires, the satisfaction of which is gratification not estimable in money. A person may desire to marry his son to another's daughter, who may consent to the match on condition of his doing him some official favour. It is bribery. A person may be taken into a caste on his promising to do an official act as a motive or reward for his re-admission. It is bribery. In short gratification is any benefit or reward given to influence one in one's behaviour in office, and incline one to act contrary to the rules of honesty and integrity. Anything, whether a sum of money, an object which appeals to one's sense, a dinner, a plateful of fruit, a medicinal pill is gratification within the meaning of the term, though the recipient may not be punishable on that account.

1536. Motive or Reward.—For, it is not the receipt of "any gratification" alone that constitutes the offence. It must have been given as a "motive or reward" to do any official act. The word "motive" evidently refers to a future act, while the word "reward" is manifestly intended to apply to a "past service." What is forbidden, speaking generally, is the receiving any gratification "as a motive" to do or a "reward" for having done any such thing as is described in the definition. It is explained that "a person may receive a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done." This explanation appears to be intended to guard against such a plea as, to refer again to that well-known case, was set up as an excuse for Lord Bacon. "It is pretended," says Hume in his history, "that Bacon had still in the seat of justice, preserved the integrity of Judge, and had given just decrees against those very persons from whom he had received the wages of iniquity."<sup>2</sup>

1537. A motive or reward may be received in any form, and it may be called by any name, but it is a bribe if it is received under the promise or on the understanding of an official favour or disfavour.<sup>1</sup> A person may receive a bribe to do what is his duty, and still it is a bribe if it is not a legal remuneration. Such is the demand of a dasturi or a customary due, by a Civil Court peon, from the complainant if he wished him to serve the summons without an identifier.<sup>2</sup> In another case, there was a semblance of consideration, but still the Court held it to be a case of bribe. There the Mahars of a village had been suspended from service, but subsequently there was a meeting of the villagers under the presidency of the patel and it was then agreed to re-employ them on payment of Rs. 300 which was to be employed in repairing the village temple. The payment itself was exacted as a fine from the Mahars who were supposed to have poisoned the village cattle during the period of their suspension, which was only from their private services to the villagers, and not from their public service to Government. The village patel who had taken a leading part in arranging for the settlement was prosecuted under this section, and Jardine, J., upheld his nominal conviction holding that the payment promised by the Mahars was a motive for their reinstatement by the village community of which the accused was the head, though in his case there was the absence of corrupt or oppressive motive, and his conduct might be explained by referring it to a wish to end quarrels, and promote a public object.

1538. But in order to constitute a bribe, it is not necessary that the motive should be corrupt or oppressive, or that the money received should have been appropriated by the receiver.<sup>3</sup> It is equally a bribe, if the money is promised to a deserving institution in return for the favour received from the officer. The mere fact that there is the show of consideration would not take the offence out of the rule. It was so held in another case, in which the accused, a kulkarni of a village, obtained 12 annas from a tenant who had received Rs. 8 as a tacavi (or agricultural loan) in consideration of his having written out the necessary papers and given the necessary evidence to enable him to obtain the loan, which was a part of his routine duty. It appeared that the accused had given out that he had worked for the tenants for eight days and that they must pay him 12 annas each, failing which he should get them into trouble. The Court held that the accused was either guilty of bribery or extortion, and his conviction for the former offence was affirmed, the Court holding that the accused made use of his official position and claimed and obtained the money as a reward for rendering services which he had not rendered in that position.<sup>4</sup>

1539. Where a constable and others entered a house and apprehended certain persons and gamblers, and afterwards released them on payment of a sum of money by the latter, the offence committed is not house-trespass and extortion, but taking a bribe as regards the constable, and abetment of that offence as regards the others.<sup>5</sup> The taking of a gratification by the reader of a judge to influence him, is clearly an offence under this section, it being wholly immaterial whether as a fact he did or did not influence him.<sup>6</sup> The question in such cases is not what the receiver did, but what he professed to do, and what the payer believed he could do, upon which he made the payment.<sup>7</sup> Indeed, the receipt of a valuable thing by a public servant, apart from motive, without consideration is in itself an offence apart from the motive of the giver or the recipient,<sup>8</sup> but if the receiver was in a position of authority over the giver, the presumption will rather be that the property was given and received as a motive for the conferral of some official favour. So where a patwari took grain presumably from the ryots of his village the Court considered it an offence under this section rather than under s. 165.<sup>9</sup>

1540. Whenever a public servant receives an illegal gratification from persons over whom he is set in authority, the Court may naturally connect the receipt of gratification with the abuse of office. But it is not conclusive, for the fact disclosed may point to another inference. Where, for example, two chowkidars discovered an amour between a widow and a goldsmith at whose shop she was seen by them at night, and who thereupon gave them a bribe to hold their tongues and thereby to save him from the disgrace that might attach to a person detected in a clandestine intrigue, it was held that, as the receipt of money was unconnected with the performance of any official act, they could not be convicted of bribery, as the hush-money received was received in a private matter in no way connected with the performance of their official duties.<sup>1</sup> The same view was taken in another case in which a vaccinator had received a sum of money from the parents of children whom he had previously vaccinated, and whom he otherwise threatened to lance to take out lymph. It was held that, since he could not legally do this without the consent of parents, his threat to cause pain to the children with a view to obtain money constituted extortion, and that the offence was not one of bribery as his abstention from lancing their arms could scarcely be said to have been forbearing to do any official act, for whether he was so ordered or no, he had no legal power to lance children for the purpose.<sup>2</sup>

1541. Legal Remuneration.—There can be, of course, no offence unless the gratification solicited or accepted was illegal. It would be illegal if it was forbidden by law, or by the rules of Government. For example, medical men, though public servants, are permitted by Government to charge their fee for medical attendance. A grateful patient may pay them a douceur for their skilful cure, but it is not a bribe, unless its acceptance was prohibited. So again, the pay received by a public servant is a legal remuneration, though it is a motive for doing an official act, namely, their duties. So again, public servants are entitled to receive any reward given or sanctioned by Government, in which case it ceases to be a gratification, but becomes a “legal remuneration”. The Government Architect may be permitted to charge a fee for designing buildings for private persons, an engineer may be permitted to charge for his services in supervising their construction. In short, the sole test of legality is the order of Government. It is not a case of mala in se but of mala que prohibita.

1542. Attempt to Obtain a Bribe.—This section speaks of the “attempt” to obtain a bribe, as being in itself an offence. Now, this word has been held to imply no more than a mere solicitation, which again may be made as effectually in implicit as in explicit terms.<sup>3</sup> Moreover, in order to constitute an attempt it is not necessary that a specific sum be asked for, or that any definite promise of return service be made. It is enough that the giver is led to believe that his money was likely to be profitably spent. So where a clerk in the Pension Department met an applicant for pension, and told him that he had succeeded in securing increased pensions in two cases, that much authority was vested in him, and that the complainant might be similarly benefited by a similar karrawai or procedure. The candidate refused to adopt the suggestion and the clerk was prosecuted for “attempting to obtain illegal gratification,” and he was convicted by Spankie and Pearson, J.J., the latter observing that “to ask for a bribe is an attempt to obtain one; and a bribe may be asked for as effectually in implicit as in explicit terms.”<sup>4</sup> Indeed, it is seldom that a person is so incautious as to call a bribe a bribe. He calls it by some euphemistic ambiguous name, dasturi, inam, or baksheesh, but a bribe is a bribe by whatever name it may be called, and howmuchsoever customary its payment may have become. The baksheesh paid to peons of Government officials, by persons having anything to do with them is a bribe, pure and simple, though its payment has passed into a tradition. So again, some degree of circumlocution is inevitable when an offer of a bribe is made to a comparative stranger. Sometimes the offer is made in a language which leaves much to be understood. For instance, where the prosecutor in a nose-cutting case fearing an adverse verdict offered some money to a juryman's brother which he refused, and he then approached the juryman, who was also the foreman, direct and said: "The nose-cutting case is a true one. There is something to be had in it. Please see your brother before going to Court. I can spend as much as Rs. 1,000 in this matter," the conversation was rightly construed to be the offer of a bribe, and the accused was thereupon convicted under section 116 read with this section.<sup>1</sup>

1543. Service in Consideration for a Bribe.—The section specifies a number of acts which form, as it were, the consideration for a bribe. They are all instances of the abuse of official position, either by favouring the giver of the bribe, or by confounding his enemies. The offence being directed against maladministration, a public servant receiving a gratification, whether for himself or for another, is equally guilty. And as there is nothing against the briber being a public servant it may be that both the giver as well as the receiver of a bribe are public servants, e.g., where a person offers a bribe to his superior officer to obtain his promotion. And as one public servant may solicit a bribe for another, it may be that a number of public servants may become involved in the same case. Again, since the receiver may render or "attempt" to render service with Government or any public servant, as such, it follows that the receiver need not necessarily be himself serviceable to the briber; for it is enough if he procures him some advantage from another, in which case law presumes that he must have exerted his influence on behalf of the person promising or paying him the bribe.

1544. That influence must, however, have been exerted in the definite channel stated in the section, that is to say, it must either amount to the doing or forbearing to do an official act or favour or service with any public servant. As an instance of such service may be mentioned the following case: A railway goods clerk suspected certain frauds in the goods office of which he made a report to his superiors. The matter was referred to the District Magistrate who referred it to the police for enquiry, and the goods clerk was deputed to assist them in the discovery and prosecution of the culprits. While on such duty, the accused offered him Rs. 500 if he closed the inquiry and returned his account-books unchecked. He was prosecuted and the question was whether the offence fell under this section, it was held that the goods clerk was a public servant, but inasmuch as he had not then any official functions in the discharge of which he could do any act or show any favour, the offence was not covered by the first and second clauses, but it was covered by the third clause of this section, inasmuch as the accused thought that the clerk alone possessed the technical knowledge necessary to bring home the suspected fraud to them from the records of the goods office, and that if he represented to the police that there was nothing disclosed in the accused's books on comparison with the railway records to prove anything against them, he could probably succeed in persuading the Police Inspector in charge of the enquiry, who was a public servant, acting as such, to make a report to that effect to the District Magistrate, and to get the case dismissed, and the books returned.<sup>2</sup>

1545. An offence committed under such circumstances may conceivably fall under the graver, though in some respects, more general provisions of section 214. If, suppose in this case, the accused, instead of approaching the clerk, had approached the Police Inspector and made him a similar offer, his offence would then be one under section 214, and not under this section. Indeed, it was so held in a case in which the accused had offered a bribe to a public servant in consideration of his not proceeding against him whose papers and books he had seized for the purpose of bringing them to legal punishment.<sup>3</sup>

1546. Briber's Liability.—The sections in this chapter deal only with the criminal liability of public servants. For reasons already given (§ 1521) they do not provide for the punishment of the giver of bribes. Such a person, however, is not wholly exempt from criminal liability. For his case is met by section 109 of the Code. A person offering a bribe, whether received or rejected, is under the provisions of that section guilty of abetment. But in order to make that section applicable, the circumstances therein stated must be strictly fulfilled. If, therefore, the offence was more in the nature of extortion than bribery, the briber would hardly be proceeded against as an abettor, whatever may be the strict view of that section. For it was not the intention of the Legislature to punish the mere payment of an illegal gratification (§ 1521). At the same time it was not intended to exempt from punishment the payer in all circumstances. If he was the tempter, he will be liable as an abettor. If he was coerced into the payment, he would not be liable merely because the payment was to his interest. But the mere fact that the briber paid the bribe because the public servant concerned had directly or indirectly solicited it, does not exempt the briber from his liability as an abettor, for to pay a bribe, on demand is an abetment of the offence,<sup>1</sup> though it may then be a question whether the demand was a mere demand or anything more. Again, in order to make a person liable for abetment there must be evidence to show that the abetment was of an offence falling under any section of the Code. So, in order to render a person liable for abetment of an offence described in this section, it must be shown that the offer was made for any of the purposes here mentioned. If such an offer be made the offence of abetment is complete, it being immaterial whether the offer was or was not accepted; the only difference it then makes, is in the degree of abetment, an offer rejected being punishable under the milder provisions of section 116, an offer accepted being punishable under section 109.<sup>2</sup>

1547. It has been, sometimes, said that, not only he who offers, but they who are present at the time of the offer or the payment, are guilty of abetment.<sup>3</sup> But this is by no means the case, for a person may be present as a spectator hand particeps.<sup>4</sup> Such a person is of course, to be distinguished from those who actually contribute to or negotiate for its payment.<sup>5</sup> But failing to be an abettor, such a person may be regarded as an accomplice, as one upon whose testimony the courts regard it as unsafe to convict a person of bribery. This question is so intimately connected with the proof of an offence under this section that a short reference to it is here necessary. (§ 1549).

1548. Testimony of Accomplices.—According to the practice of the Courts a varying degree of credibility attaches to a person who was present at the giving of a bribe. It is a rule of evidence that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars.<sup>6</sup> It is also a rule that a conviction on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice is not illegal.<sup>7</sup> The question, therefore is, what are the rules under which the Court may give effect to these two seemingly contradictory rules in cases falling under this chapter. Now it is a rule established by the practice of the Courts that, though a conviction on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice is not illegal, it is nevertheless improper.<sup>8</sup> This rule then necessitates some degree of corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, to warrant a conviction for an offence under this section. The payer of a bribe may or may not be an abettor; but he is in every case an accomplice

But even such a person is less of an abettor than one who pays unasked; Deonandan Pershad, 33 C. 649; or pays to one who merely received it as evidence against the giver; Nga Hnin, 38 I. C. (L. for the purpose of this rule.<sup>1</sup> His evidence, consequently, requires corroboration, but the degree of corroboration forthcoming must necessarily vary in each case. Therefore the Courts have considered the degree of corroboration required to justify a conviction under this chapter. For this purpose the Courts consider whether the payer was or was not a free agent in offering the bribe. And it has been held that the degree of corroboration required is not in each case the same. In other words, a person coerced into the payment requires less corroboration to his testimony, than one who was entirely a voluntary accomplice.<sup>2</sup>

1549. But in either case some corroboration is nonetheless indispensable. But whether it is or is not sufficient to warrant a conviction is a question of fact which must be left to the jury, it being then competent to them to reject the corroboration and convict the accused on the uncorroborated testimony of the accomplice.<sup>3</sup> So, where the accused, a police-officer, was charged with receiving a bribe from the complainant, and it appeared that the former had demanded it from the latter before commencing the inquiry into his complaint of the theft of lac from his forest, and the latter at first refused but eventually paid it, it was held that the case was one in which the payment was involuntary and a much slighter degree of corroboration was needed to support a conviction of the receiver, and the Court therefore accepted the testimony of persons, who had lent the money to the complainant and who were present when it was paid, as sufficient corroboration.<sup>4</sup>

1550. It has been sometimes said that persons who are present at the commission of a crime, but who do nothing to prevent or disclose it, are no better than accomplices,<sup>5</sup> and being so, they are incompetent as corroborative witnesses, as the rule undoubtedly is that the corroboration required is by independent testimony, one accomplice being incompetent to corroborate another, for two incredible witnesses do not make a story credible.

1551. Now the question whether a person who is merely present, but does nothing to prevent or disclose the commission of an offence committed in his presence, is or is not an accomplice, depends upon the nature of the offence committed and the duty cast upon him for preventing or disclosing it. The question, however, is not a question of the competency, but of the credit of such a witness. And the true rule appears to be that a person who was present at the commission of a crime, cannot be regarded as an accomplice merely because he did nothing to prevent or disclose it, unless he was under a legal obligation to do so. The cases in which spectators have been treated as accomplices are cases of murder<sup>6</sup> or theft<sup>7</sup> committed under circumstances in which the Court could justifiably suspect the non-disclosure as being due to some degree of participation in the crime. Such participation may be inferred in the case of persons who had subscribed to the payment of a bribe.<sup>8</sup> Even in such a case, they cannot be treated as accomplices if they paid the money under threats, in which case, the offence is rather one of extortion than of bribery.<sup>9</sup>

1552. No Offer.—A somewhat curious case arose in Bombay in which the Judges were not quite agreed on the subject of the accused's guilt though he was acquitted. The accused's cousin had applied for sanction to erect a building. He had himself tendered for the supply of sleepers to the Municipality. The objection to building was waived by the Commissioner. The accused came to see the Commissioner, thanked him for the waiver and reminded him of his outstanding tender for sleepers. He also enquired if it was any good putting in a tender for cement for which the Municipality had invited tenders. He said that it needed influence to secure the contract. He then said that he wanted to see the Commissioner, as his cousin wished to give him Rs. 5,000. The Commissioner became indignant whereupon the accused apologized. The accused was acquitted, and on appeal by Government it was held that the words, "my cousin wishes to give you Rs. 5,000" did not amount to an offer, but that the accused wished merely to sound the Commissioner, and that, therefore, the accused's acquittal was right.<sup>1</sup>

162. Whoever accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gratification whatever as a motive or reward for inducing, by corrupt or illegal means, any public servant to do or to forbear to do any official act, or in the exercise of the official functions of such public servant to show favour or disfavour to any person, or to render or attempt to render any service or disservice to any person with the Legislative or Executive Government of India, or with the Government of any Presidency, or with any Lieutenant-Governor, or [with any member of the Senate of the Allahabad University], or with any public servant, as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine or with both.

Taking gratification, in order, by corrupt or illegal means, to influence public servant.

1553. Analogous Law.—The words "or with any member of the Senate of the Allahabad University" were added by the Allahabad University Act<sup>2</sup> both in this as well as in the next section. This section is complementary to the last, and is intended to reach the aiders and abettors of the offence. It, therefore, extends to all persons whether or not they are public servants. Where, however, a person accepting a bribe, is a public servant, the proper section to convict him under, is the last section, and not this, which is directed against the suppression of crime by a different class of persons.<sup>3</sup>

1554. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, and summons must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session and a Presidency or First Class Magistrate.

- (1) That the accused accepted or obtained, or agreed to accept or attempted to obtain a gratification ;
- (2) That it was a motive or reward for inducing by corrupt or illegal means any public servant to do or forbear to do any official act or to show favour or render any service to any of the persons specified in the section.

1556. Charge.—The charge under this section should specify the name of the person from whom the gratification was obtained, and of the public servant to be influenced in the exercise of his official functions.<sup>4</sup>

1557. It should run thus :—

" I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

" That you—accepted, (or obtained, or agreed to obtain, etc.), for yourself (or for—) a gratification, namely, from—as a motive (or reward) for inducing—a public servant to do or forbear to do an official act to wit—(or to show some favour or disfavour to any person, to wit—, or to render or attempt to render any service or disservice to any person—with the Legislative or Executive Government, etc.), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 162 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

1558. Principle.—This and the next section deal with the offence of improperly influencing a public servant in return for consideration paid or promised by a third person. In this respect the two sections<sup>1</sup> are identical, the only difference between them being the means by which the public servant is influenced. Under this section he is influenced by corrupt or illegal means, while the inducement in the next section is by the exercise of personal influence. In other respects the two sections are identical. They are both intended to prevent the public servants from swerving from their duty by the sordid lust of gain, or yielding to the personal influence of another. But the offence in both sections depends upon the presence or promise of a consideration. If then the public servant was improperly influenced by one who was unmoved by a gratification, the result may be the same, but the seducer commits no offence, though if the means employed be “corrupt” both the seducer as well as the public servant would be guilty, the one for abetment, and the other for bribery as defined in the last section.

1559. There is no reason why a gratuitous seducer should not be held guilty, but in such a case, the seducer may have acted from the best of motives, and in this respect, Law judges criminality from the motive. Now as the motive in the two sections is palpably corrupt, it excludes the presence of nobler sentiments as prompting the interference. The sections generally agree with the English Law.<sup>2</sup>

1560. Gratification to Influence Another.—The last section dealt with the case of a public servant soliciting or receiving an illegal gratification for doing an act himself, or for rendering some service with the Government or a public servant. This section deals with such gratification in which the recipient need not be a public servant; though it must be a motive or reward for doing something by a public servant.<sup>3</sup> One public servant acting as a bribe agent of another, should preferably be punished under the last section, though there is no difference in the gravity of offences under the two sections, as measured by the maximum punishments provided therein. But a person so acting, who is not a public servant, is only punishable under this section.<sup>4</sup>

1561. In order to constitute an offence under this section, three things are essential. In the first place, there must have been the solicitation or offer or receipt of a gratification. Such gratification must have been asked for, offered or paid as a motive or reward for inducing by corrupt or illegal means some one, and that some one, a public servant. And lastly, it must be for the public servant to do an act, or confer a favour or render some service as stated in the section. It will be observed that while the last section speaks of a gratification “other than legal remuneration,” this section speaks of “any gratification whatever.” The difference in phraseology is intentional, and is intended to guard against a possible plea that the gratification received was legal, inasmuch as it was a fair compensation for the favour actually performed. Suppose, for instance, a pleader is engaged to defend a case. The remuneration paid to him is a gratification, and is legal; but if he receives it as a motive for inducing, not by fair argument but “by corrupt or illegal means,” the Judge in favour of his client, he will be punishable under this section, though but for this section, he might have escaped unpunished, for he might have induced him by means which though “illegal” were still not corrupt in which case he could not be punished as an abettor.

1562. The gist of the offence consists in receiving a gratification in order to prevent a public servant “by corrupt or illegal means.” Ordinarily, such will be the case where the public servant concerned employs an intermediary as his tout or bribe-agent. But where he is no more than a conduit-pipe between the giver and the receiver of the bribe, conveying what he receives, retaining nothing for himself, the section is inapplicable, for then he receives nothing “for inducing by corrupt or illegal means,” the public servant, which is the gist of the crime

(§ 1558). The section requires that the payment must be in promise of the inducement and the inducement must be by "corrupt or illegal means." If then a person induce a public servant without a gratification, he commits no offence under this section, though, if the means he employs be "corrupt," he may be guilty of abetment of an offence under the last section, and if the means employed be "illegal," he may conceivably be guilty of some other offence depending upon the nature of the illegality practised.

1563. If, for instance, it consisted in suppressing a part of the record of a case, or substituting therein some forged documents for the genuine documents originally filed, the offence committed by a person would be not only an offence here described, but also an offence made punishable by section 466. A person, who falsely certifies another as fit for an office, may fall within the provisions of this section if he did so for a consideration received from a third person, as a motive for inducing a public servant to appoint his nominee.<sup>1</sup> Again, if the means employed were "corrupt," it would be a question whether the corrupter is liable under this section, or as an abettor under the last. A person is said to "corrupt" another, when one draws him aside from the path of rectitude and duty by a bribe. The employment of "corrupt means" implies the payment or promise of a bribe. In such a case the public servant would almost invariably be an abettor of this offence. For one is not likely to receive a bribe to share it with another, unless the latter is privy to it. In any other case, the receiver may be guilty of cheating, but he could scarcely be convicted under this section. Of course a person may bona fide believe that he may be able to induce a public servant by "corrupt means," without having previously consulted him. His attempt to corrupt him may fail, and still he may be guilty of an offence under this section. In such a case the accused has the option of choosing his own section for his condemnation.

163. Whoever accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain, from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gratification whatever, as a motive or reward for inducing, by the exercise of personal influence, any public servant to do or to forbear to do any official act, or in the exercise of the official functions of such public servant to show favour or disfavour to any person, or to render or attempt to render any service or disservice to any person, with the Legislative or Executive Government of India, or with the Government of any Presidency, or with any Lieutenant-Governor [or with any member of the Senate of the Allahabad University], or with any public servant, as such, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

An advocate who receives a fee for arguing a case before a Judge; a person who receives pay for arranging and correcting a memorial addressed to Government, setting forth the services and claims of the memorialist; a paid agent for a condemned criminal, who lays before the Government statements tending to show that the condemnation was unjust,—are not within this section, inasmuch as they do not exercise or profess to exercise personal influence.

1564. Analogous Law.—The words "or with any member of the Senate of the Allahabad University" have been added by the Allahabad University Act.<sup>2</sup> This section is exactly the same as the last, with the only difference that the means here employed are neither corrupt nor illegal, though the same result is attained by the "exercise of personal influence."

1565. This section was clause 139 of the Bill, and as to it the Commissioners wrote thus: "This clause is much more comprehensive than the English Law, which appears to punish private persons taking reward for influencing public officers, only when their influence is used to procure office for a party.<sup>1</sup> We think the generality of clause 139 of the Code is expedient."<sup>2</sup>

(1) 2nd Rep., s. 70.

(2) Act XVIII of 1887, s. 18 (2).

1566. Procedure, Practice, and Proof.—The procedure and practice under this section is exactly the same, as under the last section, and the points to be proved are the same, with the difference above noted.

1567. The offence under this section is not cognizable, and summons may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

1568. Exercise of Personal Influence.—The exertion of personal influence upon a public servant, howmuchsoever deprecable is not an offence under the Code. The exertion of such influence in return for a consideration received from a third person—presumably the person interested—is, however, an offence under this section. In order to amount to an offence, such influence must be improper; for, without impropriety, some degree of personal influence is ordinarily exercised by one person over another. The illustration speaks of an advocate arguing a case before a Judge as excepted, because he does not exercise or profess to exercise personal influence. Now it is perfectly correct to say that he does not profess to exercise personal influence. It would also be correct to say that he does not receive his fee as a motive for the exercise of personal influence. But it is probably not quite correct to say that he does not exercise any personal influence at all, for it is common knowledge that advocates and suitors appearing before Courts cannot avoid exercising some personal influence upon the Courts in which they daily appear. That they ought not to is manifest. For it is the duty of the Judge to decide without fear or favour and influenced by any consideration other than that of doing absolute justice. It is this ideal that the section aimed at, by punishing the mercenary exercise of personal influence. If it has reprobated the exercise of personal influence in any case, its provisions would have been probably too wide. It therefore confines its penalty only to those who prostitute their personal influence.

1569. What is "Personal Influence."—The term "personal influence" has been nowhere defined, but it is a phrase allied to "undue influence" of civil law,<sup>3</sup> and it is probably used in an allied sense as meaning such influence as dominates the will of the public servant, in consequence of which, one party obtains an unfair advantage over the other. In one respect the term is even wider as implying not only the exercise of what would be termed undue influence in civil law, but also such influence as the wife wields over her husband, or one friend wields over another, which, when put to the service here contemplated, would be within the mischief of the offence here described.

164. Whoever, being a public servant, in respect of whom either of the offences defined in the last two preceding sections is committed, abets the offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

1570. Analogous Law.—This is one of the "express provisions" made by the Code for the punishment of abetment, which are referred to and excluded by section 109, and other sections of Chapter V. This section only provides an enhanced punishment for an offence which would have been otherwise punishable, under the general provisions of that chapter.

1571. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is not cognizable, and summons must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or First Class.

1572. Proof.—The points required to be proved are :—

- (1) That the accused was a public servant ;
- (2) That as such he abetted an offence punishable under section 162 or 163 ;
- (3) That such offence was committed in respect of the accused.

1573. Charge.—The charge under this section should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you—being a public servant in the—Department of Government, abetted the commission of the offence punishable under section 162 (or s. 163) by—and thereby committed an offence under section 164 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or of the High Court.)

1574. Analogous Law.—This section has been recast. It was originally so worded :—

“ 141. Whoever, being a Judge, directly or indirectly accepts, obtains or attempts to obtain, for himself or for any other party, a gift of any valuable thing other than refreshments according to the common usages of hospitality, from any party whom he knows to be plaintiff or defendant in any proceeding which is pending in the said Judge's Courts, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or fine, or both.

“ Explanation.—By a gift is meant anything which is in reality a gift, whatever colour may be given to the transaction.”

1575. Appended to the clause were the three illustrations which have been substantially reproduced under the section, only their scope being enlarged by substituting “Collector” and “Magistrate” for “Judge” in the first and last illustrations.

1576. As before remarked (see Introduction) this section is directed against the taking of bribe indirectly in the shape of presents, for which a provision so far as regards the Judges, had been made by the Bengal Regulation, 1793,<sup>1</sup> which in its turn had adopted the form of oath required to be taken under Statute 4, 18 Edward III, which ran thus :—

“Ye take not by yourself or by other, privily nor apertly, gift nor reward of gold or silver, nor of any other thing which may turn to your profit, unless it be meat or drink, and that of small value, of any man that shall have any plea of process hanging before you, as long as the same process shall be hanging, nor after for the same cause.”

1577. So it was also provided by a Statute passed in the reign of George III<sup>2</sup> making the demanding or receiving of any valuable thing as a gift or present, or under colour thereof, whether it be for the use of the party receiving the same, or for, or pretended to be for the use of the East India Company, or of any other person whatsoever, by any British subject holding, or exercising any office or employment under His Majesty or the Company in the East Indies, to be extortion and a misdemeanour at law, and punished as such.

1578. Under this Statute, one Douglas was convicted of this offence by the Court of Exchequer, which held it immaterial whether the sum received amounted to a bribe or merely a present, since the intention of the Legislature merely was to prevent gifts to public servants.<sup>3</sup> This section is narrower than the Georgian Statute which prevents the receipt of any valuable thing as a gift or present. Referring to it the authors of the Code recommended that, though the section was limited to receiving a valuable thing without consideration, which is a paraphrase of the Georgian Statute, still it was open to the executive Government to tighten the rigour of this section by rules made under the next section. The section was originally limited to the Judges, but it was later extended to apply equally to other public functionaries.

For a further discussion on the scope of this section, see Principle (§ 1583).

1579. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is not cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance ; it is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency or First Class Magistrate.

1580. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused was a public servant at the time of the commission of the offence
- (2) That he accepted or obtained or agreed to accept or attempted to obtain for himself or for some one else, a valuable thing.
- (3) Which he obtained, etc., from the person described in clauses (2) and (3).
- (4) That he gave no consideration for it, or that the consideration given was known by him to be inadequate.

1581. Under this section the evidence of transactions other than those which are the subject of the trial is inadmissible,<sup>4</sup> inasmuch as the question of guilt or innocence of the accused in such cases depends upon the actual facts and not upon the state of a man's mind or feeling, so that such evidence cannot be let in under the provisions of section 14 of the Indian Evidence Act. As Garth, C.J., remarked : “We have no right to prove that a man committed theft or any other crime on one occasion, by showing that he committed similar crimes on other occasions.”<sup>5</sup>

1582. Charge.—A charge under this section should run thus :—

“That you—being a public servant in the—Department of Government accepted (or obtained or agreed to accept or attempted to obtain) for yourself (or for any other person) a valuable thing to wit—without consideration (or for a consideration which you knew to be inadequate,) from—a person whom you knew to have been (or to be likely to be) concerned in any proceeding or business transacted in (or to be transacted or from—whom he knew to be) interested in (or related to the person so concerned by you as public servant) and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 165 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1583. Principle.—The principle underlying it is obvious. If public servants were suffered to accept presents, when they were prohibited under a penalty from accepting bribes, they will easily circumvent the prohibition by accepting a bribe in the shape of a present. The difference between the acceptance of a bribe made punishable by section 161 and this section is this. Under the former section the present is taken as a motive or reward for abuse of office; under this section the question of motive or reward is wholly immaterial, and the acceptance of a present is forbidden, because, though ostensibly taken for no consideration, it is in reality a bid for an official favour, the refusal of which, after acceptance of the present, may not be always possible.

1584. Meaning of Words.—“Any valuable thing without consideration”: A valuable thing is a thing of value. In one sense everything has some value. But as the authors observe, the section does not include things which are given and received by the rules of hospitality, such as pan and garlands, fruit or the like. “Concerned in any proceeding,” i.e., as a party and not merely as a pleader, agent or a witness. The same sense is conveyed by the words “to be interested in .....the person so concerned” which means personally and not merely professionally interested in him.

1585. Acceptance of Presents by Public Servants.—This section discourages the acceptance of presents of all kinds, by penalizing acceptance of those of value, from persons concerned in any proceeding before them, that is to say, only presents from persons with whom they are officially connected are here prohibited. There is no general prohibition against the taking of all presents from whomsoever: “Absolutely to prohibit all public functionaries from taking presents would be to prohibit a son from contributing to the support of a father, a father from giving a portion with a daughter, a brother from extricating a brother from pecuniary difficulties. No Government would wish to prevent persons intimately connected by blood, by marriage or by friendship from rendering services to each other; and no tribunals would enforce a law which should make the rendering of such a service a crime. Where no such close connection exists the receiving of large presents by a public functionary, is generally a very suspicious proceeding; but a lime, a wreath of flowers, a slice of betelnut, a drop of attar of roses poured on his handkerchief, are presents which, it would in this country, be held churlish to refuse, and which cannot corrupt the most mercenary of mankind. Other presents of more value than these, may, on account of their peculiar nature, be accepted, without affording any ground for suspicion. Luxuries socially consumed, according to the usages of hospitality, are presents of this description; it would be unreasonable to treat a man in office as a criminal, for drinking many rupees-worth of champagne in a year, at the table of an acquaintance; though if he were to suffer one of his subordinates to accept even a single rupee in specie, he might deserve exemplary punishment.” These views find expression in the section which does not make the mere acceptance of a “valuable thing,” a crime.

1586. An author of a costly book may present a copy to a Judge, and the latter commits no offence in accepting it. Indeed, it would be churlish in him to refuse such a present. So relations and friends may make and exchange presents however costly, and the recipient would commit no offence, though he be a public servant in accepting them. What the section prohibits is the acceptance of a valuable present by a public servant from a present or prospective litigant or applicant, with whom he has no other connection. In other words, the acceptance of a present when traceable to a corrupt motive is what is intended to be made punishable here.<sup>2</sup> The question whether a thing was or was not of “value” does not depend upon its market-price. It may be an article of vertu which may be priceless. The question is one of fact which the Court will have to decide in each case, having regard to the intrinsic value and price of the thing and the occasion which led to its being presented. In such a case the question of motive is material, not because it is a necessary ingredient of the crime but because it tends to explain the reason for the acceptance. For the same reason, the question of consideration is also material, for it also tends to rebut the suspicion that otherwise attaches to a transaction, which may be inexplicable, otherwise than as a veiled gratification. A thing howmuchsoever valuable may be purchased for its full value by a public servant no less than by anybody else. The section does not cast any special disability upon that class. It only creates an obligation not to circumvent those placed under them, or to make the occasion a pretext for their corruption. The section, therefore, enjoins on public servants the obligation of fair play. It demands that they shall not use their office as a lever for acquiring pelf from persons placed under circumstances in which they are naturally anxious to humour them. This is what is really implied by persons concerned in any proceeding before them.

1587. In the case of judicial officers the clause would include all litigants present and prospective, but not those who may have occasion to sue or be sued in their Courts at any time however remote. The words "likely to be concerned" mean such likelihood as may have influenced the donee in taking that fact into his calculation in offering the present. This may not be always apparent, and in the case of officials receiving presents and court peons receiving them in the form of bakshish or dasturi from persons who have to resort to Courts, the payment is more in the nature of extortion than a voluntary payment for favours to come. Take for instance, the case of the Police-clerk who was employed in the court of a Magistrate for reading case-diaries to him. One Chattra had a case of theft before that Magistrate, and he got convicted the two persons whom he had prosecuted, and on the conclusion of whose case he received back his Rs. 3, the proceeds of theft. As he left the Court-room the Police-clerk followed him and demanded from him Re. 1 as dasturi, which the latter paid. He was prosecuted and convicted under section 161 which was, of course, obviously wrong, as the payment was made on the conclusion of the case and there was no evidence that it was a reward for any service rendered by the accused. His conviction was however, altered to one under this section, the large terms of which, amply justified it.<sup>1</sup> For Chattra was certainly a person who was concerned in the criminal proceedings, with which the accused had connection in the discharge of his official functions, namely, to read the case diaries to the Magistrate. He had received a rupee without any consideration. His case therefore satisfied all the requirements of this section. Rewards paid to Court clerks, moharrirs and peons fall into the same category. They are either bribes or criminal presents, and as such punishable either under section 161 or this section. It will be observed that in the case last cited, the complainant had no more to do with the accused or the Court to which he was connected. If he had, his case would have then been one like that of the Patwari, who received grain from tenants in his circle and whose case was held to fall under section 161, rather than under this section,<sup>2</sup> because the grain was given presumably for future favours.

166. Whoever, being a public servant, knowingly disobeys any direction of the law as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will, by such disobedience, cause injury to any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

1588. Analogous Law.—This section is directed against official perversity. It makes it a crime on the part of a Public servant to knowingly cause injury to any person by his violation of the rules of law regulating his conduct. The section has nothing to do with the disciplinary rules of his department, the violation of which may call for departmental punishment. It is only concerned with the violation of the express direction of law, which alone is punishable, if it has resulted in the injury to any person. On this subject elaborate provisions exist in English Law, under which the neglect of official duty is an indictable offence<sup>1</sup> and a person holding a public office, whether directly or derivatively under the King, is considered as amenable to the law for every part of his conduct, and obnoxious to punishment for not faithfully discharging it.<sup>2</sup> And an indictment lies at common law against all subordinate officers for neglect as well as misconduct in the discharge of their official duties.<sup>3</sup>

1589. In the words of the Law Commissioners this section is very comprehensive and includes several offences respecting the abuse of official authority, and regarding officers omitting to arrest offenders and suffering prisoners to escape, so far as the offence is voluntary, and in general, any breach of official duty, by which it is intended, or which is known to be likely to injure any party, or to save any person from legal punishments.<sup>4</sup>

1590. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but summons may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Magistrate—Presidency, First or Second class.

1591. Charge.—It was pointed out by Trevor, J., that a charge under this section should describe the imputed offence as nearly as possible in the language of the Code.<sup>5</sup> It should specify the particular direction of the law which the accused is alleged to have disobeyed.<sup>6</sup>

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“ That you—on or about the —day of —at, did (or omitted to do, as the case may be)—such conduct being contrary to the provisions of Act—section—and known by you to be prejudicial to—and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 166 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or High Court).

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried (in case of committal, by the said Court) on the said charge.”<sup>7</sup>

1593. Principle.—The offence made punishable by the section consists in the wilful disobedience of an express direction of law; a disobedience to an order is not sufficient, even though that order may be one that was given under a provision of law.<sup>8</sup> So the mere breach of departmental rules and regulations not having the force of law cannot be visited with punishment under this section, which contemplates only the breach of some statutory duty, not merely through inadvertence or negligence, but of purpose to cause injury to any person. It is an abuse of office in which law presumes that the injury was caused from some ulterior corrupt motive. A mere dereliction of duty unconnected with injury to any one is not an offence under this section, though it may be, under some other Act. For example, a postal official absenting himself from his station without leave may be punished under the Post Office Act. He could not be punished under this section, though his absence may have occasioned inconvenience and injury to the public.<sup>9</sup>

1594. But a bailiff who refuses to seize property in execution, with the knowledge that it is likely to cause injury to the decree-holder offends under this section, because there is in his case a wilful disobedience of law resulting in injury to a person. Such injury need not result in permanent deprivation of property. For it is an "injury" that the decree-holder is delayed in the recovery of his debt. Indeed, the term "injury" is comprehensive enough to include any harm illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation, or property.<sup>1</sup> So it has been held in England that if an under-sheriff obtain his fees by refusing to execute process till they are paid,<sup>2</sup> or take a bond for his fee before execution issued out, it is extortion,<sup>3</sup> for the sheriff's fee is not due until execution. The accused, a peon of a Civil Court, was given a notice for service on the complainant. He misrepresented it to be a warrant and actually arrested the complainant, under colour of the alleged warrant, presumably with the object of extorting money. He was convicted for this offence, and the High Court naturally upheld his conviction.<sup>4</sup> The word "person" has been described in section 11. It bears that sense in this definition. Consequently, a disobedience of law resulting in injury to the public, could not be punished under this section.

167. Whoever, being a public servant, and being, as such public servant, charged with the preparation or translation of any document, frames or translates that document in a manner which he knows or believes to be incorrect intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause, injury to any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Injury—s. 44.]

1595. Analogous Law.—This section is closely analogous to section 218, and the two offences might more conveniently have been treated as one. They are in fact indistinguishable except that this section specifically penalises the framer as well as the translator of a document. Both are, however, specific cases in which the public servant knowingly disobeys a direction of law knowing it likely that it would cause injury to any person.<sup>5</sup> Being, however, offences calling for condign punishment, they form the subject of special sections. The language of this section was objected to on the ground of its vague generality but the Commissioners observed that the section, though comprehensive, was not indefinite.<sup>6</sup> An offence under this section may be included in those punishable under ss. 467 and 471, in which a dual conviction would be illegal.<sup>7</sup>

1596. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but summons may ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable; it is triable by the Court of Session or Presidency or First Class Magistrate.

- (1) That the accused was a public servant.
- (2) That he was charged with the preparation or translation of any document.
- (3) That he framed or translated it in an incorrect manner.
- (4) That he did so knowingly.
- (5) That he did so with intent or with knowledge that it was likely that he would thereby cause injury.

1598. Charge.—A charge under this section should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

"That you—on or about the—day of—at—being a public servant to wit,—and being as such public servant, charged with the preparation (or translation) of the document relating to—, framed (or translated) that document in a manner which you knew (or believed) to be incorrect, intending thereby to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you might thereby cause) injury to—, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 167 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

1598-A. Principle.—Public records owe their sanctity to the presumption that arises as to their correctness, and as representing the true record of proceedings of the Courts and the public servants concerned. The tampering of such records by the very persons charged with the duty of preparing them correctly is, therefore, regarded as an egregious offence and as such punishable under this section, if it was prepared to cause injury to any person. Otherwise, there being no motive to falsify the record, the misconduct, if any, is left for departmental punishments.

1599. Meaning of Words.—" Preparation or translation of any document " : Does "preparation" or "framing" include also copying? According to one view it does,<sup>1</sup> according to another it does not,<sup>2</sup> but the latter appears to be the correct view, as the copying of a document cannot be said to be preparing or framing it, and the collocation of the word "translation" excludes its figurative extension. "Intending thereby to cause": Such intention and knowledge must necessarily be a matter of inference. But facts justifying that inference must be established by the prosecution.

1600. Preparation of False Record by Public Servant.—This section punishes a public servant for incorrectly "framing or translation" a document, the preparation or translation of which is within the scope of his official duty, provided that he knew of it, and it was done with the intention or knowledge that it was likely to cause injury to any person. The public servants affected by this rule are not only those who are ordinarily employed to prepare or translate documents, but it includes also those, who may have been at any time ordered to prepare or translate documents, though that work may not fall within the ordinary sphere of their official duty. It must, however, be a work entrusted to them in their capacity as public servants, for they are not otherwise so liable.

1601. Again the section speaks of the framing or translating of a document, with the preparation and translation of which the public servant was charged. The word "framing" would thus appear to convey the same sense as the word "preparation." And since the word "translation" has been expressly mentioned, it would seem that the terms "preparation," and "framing" were not intended to include a mere translation. If so, they would certainly not include copying. And it has been so held in a case in the Punjab.<sup>3</sup> On the other hand, the contrary was laid down in another case of the same Court.<sup>4</sup> The words "preparation" and "framing" are etymologically different,<sup>5</sup> but they both suggest the making of something original, and not a mere translation or a copy. And the fact that the word "translation" has been advisedly used in the section, would seem to confirm this view. The falsification of the document must be made in a manner which he knows or believes to be incorrect, and which excludes mistakes, and mistranslation due to mere ignorance or negligence.

1602. The section is intended to punish official perversity, and not mere incompetence. It penalizes those who, from base or corrupt motives, prostitute their office, whether by doing a wrong act, or by preparing an incorrect document. Certain cartman had reported a dacoity to the Station House officer, who falsely recorded their statement that there had been no dacoity "as they had previously stated to the Inspector." This statement was intended to shield the Inspector and support his conduct. The Court held him guilty under section 218, and he might have been equally convicted under this section.<sup>6</sup> So where an Amin who was entrusted with the execution of a warrant for the attachment of moveable property, submitted a report to the Court with a certificate falsely stating in them, that certain persons had forcibly rescued the attached property, while as a matter of fact, it had been released by an amicable settlement with the consent of the attaching creditor, it was held that he was a public servant charged with the preparation of a document, and had, as such, framed an incorrect document, and, that he was, therefore, liable to punishment under this section.<sup>1</sup>

1603. Of course, where a document is wantonly framed incorrect, it will be presumed that it could not have been done so innocently, and it may then be presumed that the person who so made it must have known that it was likely to cause injury to the person affected thereby. Where this is not the case some evidence on the point would, of course, be necessary.

Public Servant—s. 21.

Legally bound—s. 43.]

1604. Analogous Law.—All public servants are not debarred from engaging in trade, nor are all public servants punishable for trading. Only those who are legally bound not to engage in trade are punishable by the section; others transgressing departmental rules against trading being only liable to departmental punishment.

1605. Public servants have been legally prohibited from engaging in trade by a number of enactments.<sup>2</sup>

1606. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, and summons must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by a Magistrate, Presidency or First Class. The question whether a previous sanction of the Local Government, as provided by s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code, is necessary, depends upon whether the officer is discharging an official duty. Thus, a Municipal Commissioner taking a contract from the Municipality, of which he is a member, would, under several Municipal Acts, be punishable under this section.<sup>3</sup>

1607. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“ That you——on or about the——day of——at——being a public servant, to wit——, and being as such public servant legally bound not to engage in trade, did engage in trade, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 168 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1608. Principle.—There are two reasons why public servants should not engage in trade. In the first place, they are employed by the State, and it is their duty to devote all their time to its service. And secondly, if public servants were permitted to engage in trade, they will neglect their legitimate duties for the purpose of trade, and moreover secure an unfair advantage over rival traders not so favourably circumstanced. Public servants are therefore universally restrained from engaging in trade during the period of their service.<sup>1</sup>

1609. But they are only debarred from trading and are not otherwise prohibited from laying out their savings to advantage. They may, for instance, lend money on interest, which is not “unlawfully engaging in trade” within the meaning of the rule.<sup>2</sup> They may buy and sell stock, take shares in a public company, though they cannot act as its director. They may build and rent houses, own and manage landed property. All they must not do is to “engage in trade” which means that they must not habitually buy and sell with a view to profit, e.g., keep a shop.<sup>3</sup> either in their own name or as a partner or benami in the name of another.

169. Whoever, being a public servant, and being legally bound, as such public servant, not to purchase or bid for certain property, purchases or bids for that property, either in his own name or in the name of another, or jointly, or in shares with others, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both; and the property, if purchased, shall be confiscated.

Legally bound—s. 43]

1610. Analogous Law.—This section is a continuation of the last section and deals with the same subject. It punishes bidding for or buying property which the public servant is legally prohibited from bidding for or buying.

1611. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but non-compoundable, and is triable by a Magistrate, Presidency or First Class.

- (1) That the accused was a public servant.
- (2) That, as such, he was legally bound not to purchase or bid for the property in question.
- (3) That he had purchased or bid for that property either in his own name, or in the name of another, or jointly or in shares with others.

1613. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“That you—on or about the—day of—, at—, being a public servant, to wit—, and being as such public servant legally bound not to purchase or bid for certain property, to wit—purchased (or bid for) that property, either in your own name (or in the name of another jointly or in shares with others), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 168 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1614. Principle.—The prohibition here contemplated must be in respect of property with which the public servant was connected in his official capacity. Being thus placed in a position of advantage, he could not be permitted to purchase property of which he is in effect a trustee. So where a Sub-Inspector of Police in charge of a station-house was charged with having purchased a pony, which had been impounded at that station, and it appeared that he had in fact held no sale but falsely reported that a sale had been held and the pony sold to another party, from whom he alleged to have subsequently purchased it, it was held that the accused should have been convicted under this section, and not of breach of trust of which he was convicted.<sup>1</sup>

170. Whoever pretends to hold any particular office as a public servant, knowing that he does not hold such office or falsely personates any other person holding such office, and in such assumed character does or attempts to do any act under colour of such office, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

1615. Analogous Law.—This section may be compared with s. 140 of the Code under which it is an offence to wear garb or carry token used by a soldier. This section, and the next punish similar offences. Under this section the mere personation of a public servant is not an offence, unless it is accompanied by any act done under colour of such office. In short the offence consists in the fraudulent personation of a public servant, and not merely in personation, apart from fraud.

1616. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, and warrant must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but non-compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate.

- (1) That the accused falsely pretended to be or personated a public servant.
- (2) That he did so knowingly.
- (3) That when assuming such character he did or attempted to do something under colour of such office.

1618. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—, at—, pretended to hold that office of—, as a public servant (or falsely personated—holding such office), and in such assumed character did (or attempted to do) under colour of such office, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1619. Principle.—This section punishes fraudulent acts done in the guise of a public servant. It does not punish a mere false personation, but an act done in that guise the doing of which is therefore fraudulent.

1620. Meaning of Words.—“ Pretends to hold any particular office,” that is, whoever falsely holds himself out, or alleges that he is a public servant. “ Knowing that he does not hold such office ” : If a person “ pretends ” to be a public servant, he must of necessity know that he does not hold such office. “ And in such assumed character,” that is, the false personation must have been used to gain some advantage or in that capacity some act should have been done. “ Under colour of such office,” that is, making use of such office.

1621. Fraudulent Personation of Public Servant.—The offence punishable under this section consists of fraud practised in the guise of a public servant. The person either falsely gives out or makes people believe that he is a public servant and, impressing others as such, he does or attempts to do any act in his assumed capacity. As the gist of the offence consists in acting under the colour of his pretended office, a person cannot be convicted under this section unless there was both pretension or personation followed by an act.<sup>2</sup> The pretension or personation must relate to any “ particular office,” such as a Police Constable, a Municipal Secretary, a Revenue Peon or the like. It means that the office pretended must be a particular rank, for it is only then that the personator can defraud others, so as to commit an offence under this section.

(1) Rajkrishna Biswas, 16 W. R. 52.

(2) Nga Pe, (1892-1896) U. B. R. 168.

1622. Of course, fraud is otherwise equally possible, as a person pretending to be a servant of Government may travel through a district and obtain money and supplies, though he may not pretend to hold any particular office. But in such a case the offence he would be guilty of is cheating, and not of false personation here described. So where the accused got admission to a railway platform without a ticket by falsely giving himself out as a C.I.D. officer, who were admitted free, the court set aside his conviction holding that the mere assumption of a false character without any attempt to do an official act was not sufficient to expose the offender to the penalty of this section.<sup>1</sup> But where a person falsely personated a Head Constable of Police, and under colour of such pretended office went to some of the villagers of Jaypore and extorted from them a small fee reprimanding them on the state of their roads, it was held that the accused having practised imposition on the villagers who expected a visit from the police officers for a similar purpose, was guilty of an offence under this section.<sup>2</sup> Here it will be observed that the accused had done the act of reprimanding, which would have been legal in the public servant he had falsely personated. But this is by no means necessary. For a person may, under the colour of his office, do an act wholly illegal and unconnected with it, though it must bear some relation to his pretended office. In other words, the pretended office must be used as a means to facilitate the commission of the act.

1623. So where a person pretended to be an octroi patrol and as such, intercepted the complainant while passing to a city and charged him with smuggling oil without payment of duty. He showed the pass he had received in proof of payment, but nevertheless the accused extorted Re. 1 by threats of imprisonment. He was held guilty both of extortion, as well as of an offence under this section.<sup>3</sup> In another case, the accused pretending to be a Head Constable was caught demanding one anna's worth of fruit from a fruit-seller for one pice, on the ground that he was a Head Constable, and his conviction under this section was upheld.<sup>4</sup> In all such cases, the accused did an act, and that act a fraudulent one, under colour of an office. But if a person acts in good faith, he cannot be convicted under this section, though he may otherwise do an act wholly illegal under colour of an office which he has no right to hold. So where a village Revenue officer exercised the powers of a village Magistrate in the absence of the regular incumbent, and it was found that he believed that he was so empowered, it was held that having acted in good faith he could not be convicted under this section.<sup>5</sup>

171. Whoever, not belonging to a certain class of public servants,
 Wearing garb or carrying token used by public servant with fraudulent intent. wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or token used by that class of public servants, with the intention that it may be believed, or with the knowledge that it is likely to be believed, that he belongs to that class of public servants, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

1624. Analogous Law.—This section may be generally compared with section 140, the provisions of which are analogous. The two sections are designed to prevent persons masquerading as public servants, and making the public believe them to be so. As such, deception lies on the threshold of greater fraud which becomes thereby possible, law deems it an offence and punishes it as such, though no act be done or attempted in that guise. If, of course, an act is done or attempted, it then constitutes an offence under the last section. So it has been held in England that the mere wearing of a garb or carrying a token of a public servant with the intention or knowledge that one will thereby pass off as a public servant, is enough to constitute an offence.<sup>1</sup>

1625. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is cognizable, but summons may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate and may be tried summarily.

1626. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused wore the garb or carried a token of a public servant.
- (2) That it either was the garb or token of a public servant or resembled it.
- (3) That the accused was not a public servant entitled to use such garb or token.
- (4) That he wore the garb or carried the token with the intention or knowledge that he was likely to be believed that he was such a public servant.

1627. Fraudulent Disguise.—The wearing of a garb or carrying the token of a public servant without the intention of practising deception upon others is not an offence. (§ 1621). It becomes an offence only if there was that intention, law regarding such an act as preparatory to the preparation of crime by making use of that disguise, which must, however, be at least as complete as is contemplated by the section. For instance, if it is a garb, he must wear it and not merely carry it under his arm; if it is a token he must carry it, and not merely have it in his possession. So it was held in a case that where the accused was carrying a police jacket under his arm intending thereby to pass himself off as a Police Constable, he could not be convicted of an offence under this section.<sup>2</sup>

1628. A person may both wear the garb of a public servant, and use it for the purpose of fraud. In that case the wearing of the garb being subservient to the commission of the greater offence under the last section, he could only be convicted of that offence, and not of both the offences made punishable by this and the last section.<sup>3</sup>

CHAPTER IX-A.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO ELECTIONS.

1629. Topical Introduction.—The nine sections comprising this chapter constitute Part I of the Indian Elections Offences and Inquiries Act, 1920.<sup>1</sup> This Act comprises two parts, the first part adds Explanation 3 to section 21 and the whole of this chapter to the Code. Part II comprises 13 clauses and deals with Election Inquiries. In his speech introducing the Bill<sup>2</sup> in the Indian Legislative Council, Sir William Vincent, Home Member, acknowledged its origin<sup>3</sup> to the recommendation of the Joint Parliamentary Committee appointed to report on the Government of India (Amendment) Bill 1919,<sup>4</sup> to enact such a measure. They said: "The Committee are firmly convinced that a complete and stringent Corrupt Practices Act should be brought into operation before the first election to the Legislative Council. There is no such Act at present in existence in India and the Committee are convinced that it will not be less required in India than it is in other countries."

1630. The Government of India improved upon this recommendation and drafted a Bill applicable to elections to all public bodies. The Select Committee to whom the Bill was referred approved of its extended scope in the following terms:—

"We feel that there are distinct advantages at the present time when election is to play an important part in the new public life of India, that the public conscience should be markedly drawn to the danger of corrupt practices in relation to the franchise, whether that franchise relates to legislative or other bodies. We feel it is of the greatest importance that the principle of the purity of the franchise should be insisted on in the general criminal law of the country, and that it should not be left to local Legislatures to deal with the broad principles enacted in Part I of the Bill. There will be sufficient scope for those bodies in elaborating and supplementing the law as proposed in the Bill for we recognise that it is by no means exhaustive. Experience may no doubt show that minor offences will require to be provided against and that local conditions may need local treatment. We feel, however, that to lay down the broad basis of a law so necessary to protect the purity of the franchise is an appropriate piece of work for the Imperial Legislative Council."<sup>5</sup>

1631. The Bill came up for consideration on the 25th September 1920 when it was passed.<sup>6</sup>

1632. It will be seen that Part I of the Act penalizes the five offences of bribery, undue influence, personation, the publication of a false statement of fact, and the failure to keep accounts.

The Bill was admitted to follow generally the present English practice.

1633. Before the enactment of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854<sup>7</sup> there was no statute law penalizing malpractices at elections which were however punishable at Common law. A reference to the early cases, however, shows that it was inadequate to prevent and punish all malpractices. Consequently, the Act of 1854, which applied only to Parliamentary elections, exhaustively defined the offence of bribery.<sup>8</sup> A similar clause against bribery was inserted in the Representation of People Act, 1867.<sup>9</sup> This Act was likewise limited to Parliamentary elections. The Ballot Act, 1872<sup>10</sup> added to the offence of bribery that of personation at Parliamentary and Municipal elections.<sup>11</sup> All these Acts were repealed and a more comprehensive Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act was enacted in 1883.<sup>12</sup> It penalizes the offences of bribery,<sup>13</sup> undue influence,<sup>14</sup> personation,<sup>15</sup> and publication of false statements under the head of illegal practice.<sup>16</sup> The provisions of this Act have since been extended to Municipal<sup>17</sup> and other elections.

1634. In England, malpractices in connection with an election are punishable either as felonies, misdemeanours or corrupt and illegal practices. "A corrupt practice is a thing the mind goes with. An illegal practice is a thing the Legislature is determined to prevent, whether it is done honestly or dishonestly.''<sup>1</sup> In this chapter sections 171-B and 171-D (bribery and personation) afford instances of felonies, sections 171-C and 171-G (undue influence and false statement) afford instances of a corrupt practice, and sections 171-H and 171-I of an illegal practice.

1635. In the ensuing commentary under this Chapter references will be made to the corresponding provisions of English Law and the cases decided under the Common and Statute law on the subject. It is, however, held that, since elections in India are of recent origin, this chapter prescribes punishments more lenient than the English Law<sup>2</sup>

171-A. For the purposes of this Chapter—

(a) “candidate” means a person who has been nominated as a “Candidate” and candidate at any election and includes a person who, “electoral right” defined. when an election is in contemplation, holds himself out as a prospective candidate thereat: provided that he is subsequently nominated as a candidate at such election;

(b) “electoral right” means the right of a person to stand, or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being, a candidate or to vote or refrain from voting at an election.

1636. Analogous Law.—The definitions in this section are adopted from the definition of those terms in the English Statutes mentioned below:—

“The term ‘candidate’ is thus defined in the English Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 77 and adopted (except where the context otherwise requires) by the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, s. 34 in which the term ‘candidate’ means a person elected, or having been nominated, or declared himself a candidate for election to a corporate office.”

1637. In point of time a person becomes a candidate under the English Act<sup>3</sup> as soon as he is “declared by himself or by others to be a candidate on or after the day of the issue of the writ for such selection, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ has been issued.” The same idea is crystallized in the definition which makes a person a candidate as soon as a vacancy has occurred, and “an election is in contemplation” which must ordinarily mean in contemplation by Government. But a person who gives himself out as a candidate is as it were in fieri. He becomes a full fledged candidate with his nomination though his liability relates back to the date of his declaration. Such declaration must be in the form of a formal announcement made to the electors in the form of a manifesto, election address or the publication of one’s intention that one would offer himself for election.

1638. No one is a candidate before the dissolution or vacancy.<sup>4</sup> In England a person was held to have become a candidate as soon as he announced his intention even three years before the actual election.<sup>5</sup> There is no room for this latitude in construction under the present definition, since an election cannot be said to be in contemplation until after the dissolution of or vacancy in the body.

1639. The term “electoral right” has an analogue in the English Law. It is here used to embrace not only the voter’s right but also the right which the candidate, whether a voter or not possesses of offering or not offering himself as a candidate for an election or to withdraw his candidature therefrom.

Provided that a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action shall not be an offence under this section.

(2) A person who offers, or agrees to give, or offers or attempts to procure, a gratification shall be deemed to give a gratification.

(3) A person who obtains or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain a gratification, shall be deemed to accept a gratification, and a person who accepts a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done, shall be deemed to have accepted the gratification as a reward.

"S. 3. (i) Every voter who shall, before or during any election directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive, agree, or contract for any money, gift, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place, or employment, for himself or for any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting at any election.

"(ii) Every person who shall, after any election, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive any money or valuable consideration on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any election."

1641. To this must be added the one taken from the Representation of the People Act, 1867 :<sup>2</sup>—

"S. 49. Any person, either directly or indirectly, corruptly paying any rate on behalf of any ratepayer for the purpose of enabling him to be registered as a voter, thereby to influence his vote at the future election, and any candidate or other person, either directly or indirectly, paying any rate on behalf of any voter for the purpose of inducing him to vote or refrain from voting, shall be guilty of bribery, and be punishable accordingly ; and any person on whose behalf and with whose privity any such payment as is mentioned in this section, is made, shall also be guilty of bribery, and punishable accordingly."<sup>3</sup>

1642. Clause (1) refers to giving, Clause (2) to taking a bribe defined in terms "of a gratification" and limited by the Proviso. Clause (3) defines the giver and the last Clause (4) the receiver of such gratification. The term "gratification" has been previously used in and explained under s. 161. It is not necessarily limited to money or money's worth, since anything done or omitted to be done may amount to a gratification and consequently a bribe. For example, the promise of a situation or employment<sup>4</sup> or the offer to vacate an office in favour of the bribe<sup>5</sup> are within the mischief of the rule. So was the abetment of a nuisance held to fall within it. The landlord's estate was infested with rabbits. He allowed trappers but on the eve of the election yielded to the solicitude of his tenants to destroy them. He was held to have bribed because "what was done was done not so much from an abstract sense of justice as from a desire to influence the election."<sup>6</sup> The distribution of refreshments,<sup>7</sup> the hiring of a voter's house,<sup>8</sup> or paying him for the exhibition of bills and posters<sup>9</sup> are other instances.

1643. Bribery and Corruption.—The number of cases on bribery and corruption in connection with the election is a legion. Those which fall on the border line are alone worthy of consideration. In England, it has been held that while the payment of the money to a voter before election is a bribe, it is not a bribe if it is paid after he has voted, unless it is shown to have been done corruptly,<sup>1</sup> that is, in fulfilment of a previous promise<sup>2</sup> or done what is wrong or with an evil purpose,<sup>3</sup> that is, in the language of the section it is a reward for his vote. Gift of money or a loan made to a voter stand on the same footing. So is the conferral of office or employment whether temporary or permanent.<sup>4</sup> Payment of rates and taxes on behalf of a voter to enable him to get his name registered on the electoral roll is treated with suspicion and would be regarded as a bribe if the voters were expected to support their paymaster.<sup>5</sup> Payment of travelling and conveyance expenses to a voter is per se not a bribe, though it would be so treated if it is made conditionally upon his coming and voting for the payer.<sup>6</sup> It is not conditional if the payer merely expresses a hope that the payee would vote for him.<sup>7</sup> But it is otherwise if the promisor say to the voter that he would pay his expenses if he would vote for him.<sup>8</sup> Excessive payment of travelling expenses was held to be a bribe.<sup>9</sup> Payment made to keep away voters from voting is a bribe.<sup>10</sup>

1644. Payment for Loss of Time.—Payment to the voter for loss of time is equally within the rule.<sup>11</sup> But payment of wages by an employer to his employee for the time necessary to record his vote is not within the rule, provided it is done to all alike and not with the intention of influencing votes.<sup>12</sup> The declaration of the election day as a public holiday is justifiable on this ground.

1645. In England, the payment of the necessary expenses for travelling has been held to be no bribery, provided the expenses were not excessive and the payment is not made in return for a promise to vote in favour of the payer.<sup>13</sup> It is said that such payment is not intended to induce but only enable him to vote.<sup>14</sup>

1646. Contributions to Charities.—Contributions to charities are not bribes if they are not unusual or excessive<sup>15</sup> nor it is a bribe to assist a voter in distress.<sup>16</sup> So where the candidate distributed a sum of money to the poor, not voters of a parish, the day before the poll, it was held to be no bribe,<sup>17</sup> even though the distribution be shown to have been made in view of the election. In such cases it was said that where two motives could exist, one pure and the other corrupt, there was no necessity to impute the corrupt motive.<sup>18</sup> But this is a question of degree and it would always be a question in each case whether the distribution was made out of a charitable impulse or as an inducement to catch votes.<sup>19</sup> Where the candidate had two years before the election distributed £250 for the relief of miners and their families during a lockout with a request that his name should not be disclosed, but afterwards his agent appealed to them for their votes on that ground, it was held that his post facto conduct could not convert the gift into a bribe.<sup>20</sup> In such cases the question is what was the governing principle in the mind of the donor.

1647. Treating.—“Treating” includes the giving of refreshments and entertainment to voters at an election. It is probably not an offence at Common Law<sup>21</sup> until it became excessive and extravagant leading to enormous expense on the one hand and debauchery on the other. Later on its abuse led to its recognition even as a form of bribery at Common Law. It was prohibited by several statutes<sup>1</sup> now consolidated in the Corrupt Practices Act, 1884, s. 1 which prohibits the giving or paying for any entertainment "for the purpose of corruptly influencing that person or any person to give or refrain from giving his vote at the election." This clause classes as corrupt practice the treating of non-voters in order that they might influence votes.<sup>1</sup> The question whether anything amounts to treating is a question of fact. It is however clear that all treating is not bribery, As Cave, J., observed: "The statute does not apply to that form of treating which exists occasionally between social equals, where the first one treats, and then the other treats, which is only one form of hospitality. Neither does it apply to certain kinds of treating which exist in relation to business matters.....It applies to that sort of treating which exists where the superior treats his inferior, the treating which gives the greater influence over the person treated and secures to the former the goodwill of the latter. ....It must have reference to some election, and it must be for the purpose of influencing the vote of the person treated."<sup>2</sup> Subject to this, wherever the intention is to secure popularity and thereby to influence the votes, it is a corrupt practice.<sup>3</sup> It is not necessary that the treating should be by the candidate himself or his agent. Treating by Political Associations interested in the election of its members is equally within the rule,<sup>4</sup> unless of course it is a treat given by a non-political Association to which the rival candidates belong and it could not therefore influence the election or arouse suspicion as to its motive of influencing the votes.<sup>5</sup>

1648. It should be added that many of the English cases were cases of treating in which the sole question was whether the election should not be avoided for corrupt practice. As this section enacts an offence, cases of treating which would be considered sufficient to avoid an election would not necessarily be those in which the offender would be held to have committed the offence punishable under this section.

1649. What is not Bribery.—The payment of large sums of money to election agents is not bribery.<sup>6</sup> So payment may be made to persons to maintain order at the poll;<sup>7</sup> so is also the employment in large numbers of clerks, messengers, bill-posters and sandwichmen, though many of them be voters.<sup>8</sup> The payment of the election expenses to a candidate whether by subscription or by another candidate is not a bribe unless the payment was made on conditions which contravene the statute.<sup>9</sup> shall be deemed to interfere with the free exercise of the electoral right of such candidate or voter, within the meaning of sub-section (1).

(3) A declaration of public policy or a promise of public action or the mere exercise of a legal right without intent to interfere with an electoral right, shall not be deemed to be interference within the meaning of this section.

1650. Analogous Law.—The following explanation refers to this section in the Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill:—

“Undue influence at an election is defined as the voluntary interference or attempted interference with the right of any person to stand, or not to stand, or withdraw from being, a candidate, or to vote or refrain from voting. This covers all threats of injury to person or property and all illegal methods of persuasion and any interference with the liberty of the candidates or the electors. A sub-section is added to explain that the inducing or attempting to induce a person to believe that he will become the object of Divine displeasure is also interference. It is not, however, interference within the meaning of the clause to make a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action.”<sup>1</sup>

“Every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf make use of or threaten to make use of any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten to inflict, by himself or by any other person, any temporal or spiritual injury, damage, harm, or loss upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting at any election, or who shall, by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent device or contrivance impede or prevent the free exercise of the franchise of any elector, or shall thereby compel, induce, or prevail upon any elector either to give or refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be guilty of undue influence.”

1652. The essence of undue influence is the use of unfair pressure upon a voter exerted by the use of coercion, intimidation or inducement which deprives a person of the freedom of his judgment. As Willes, J., said: “the law cannot strike at the existence of influence. The law can no more take away from a man who has property, or who can give employment, the insensible but powerful influence he has over those whom he can benefit by the proper use of his wealth, than the law could take away his honesty, good feeling, etc., or any other qualities which give a man influence over his fellows. It is the abuse of influence with which alone the law can deal.....It is only abuse in cases of this kind, where an inducement is held out by a promise to induce voters to vote or not to vote at an election”<sup>2</sup>

1653. Undue influence, under English Law as under this section, only refers to the influence exerted upon individual voters<sup>3</sup> by any of the three following means namely: (a) The use of open force or violence, or the threat thereof; (b) The infliction of any temporal injury, damage, harm or loss, or by the threat thereof; (c) The infliction of any spiritual injury, damage, harm or loss, or by the threat thereof.

1654. It is not necessary that the unfair means employed should be effective in converting the votes, all that is necessary is that the influence should be exerted and that it should be “undue” within the meaning of law.<sup>4</sup>

1655. The ensuing commentary exemplifies the application of these rules in practice.

1656. Undue Influence at Election.—This section merely crystallizes the judicial view on the subject of undue influence. In one case Blackburn, J., said: “Where a person in order to prevent another from voting or to force him to vote, either beats him, or threatens injury to his person or his house, or the like, that is undue influence.....Where such a thing is done and is brought home to the agent, according to my view it avoids the election.”<sup>5</sup>

(5) North Norfolk, 1869) 1 O.M. & H. 240.

1657. No Undue Influence.—It has been laid down that in order to amount to undue influence by a threat of loss or injury to one's business, the loss threatened must be an appreciable loss so as to affect the saleable value of the business. So it is open to one to say: "I will deal with you not in accordance with the quality of your goods, but according to the quality of your politics."<sup>1</sup> So an influential person may address the voters, and the latter may feel persuaded by him which they would not have done if a less influential personage had approached him. Such influence is subtle but not improper. So where a clergyman attended a meeting to select a candidate<sup>2</sup> or addressed his congregation in favour of a candidate<sup>3</sup> or canvassed persons for him, the Court held his conduct unobjectionable.<sup>4</sup> So while it was an objectionable misrepresentation for a candidate to distribute a circular amongst the voters containing a copy of the ballot paper with a cross mark against the candidate's name asking the voters to make that mark against the name of the candidate and to make no mark against the name of any other candidate otherwise their votes would be lost, still it did not amount to the exercise of undue influence.<sup>5</sup> It was pointed out that the Act did not penalize every species of misconduct, but only that which was specified. So it has been held that the creation of a riot or other disturbance has not the effect of undue influence unless it was designed and had the effect of deterring the voters.<sup>6</sup> The test in such cases is, was the disturbance calculated to overawe the electors and was it such that a man of ordinary nerve and courage would be deterred from proceeding to the poll.<sup>7</sup> Here again it is not necessary that any voter was in fact deterred from voting although, of course, if any voter was so deterred it would strengthen the case for the prosecution.<sup>8</sup>

1658. Analogous Law.—In the Statement of Objects and Reasons this section is thus justified: "The definition of 'personation' closely follows the definition in s. 24 of the Ballot Act, 1872, and covers both a person who attempts to vote in another person's name or in a fictitious name, a voter who attempts to vote twice and any person who abets, procures or attempts to procure such voting."<sup>9</sup>

"A person shall for all purposes of the laws relating to parliamentary and municipal elections, be deemed to be guilty of the offence of personation who, at an election for a county or borough, or at a municipal election, applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, whether that name be that of a person living or dead, or of a fictitious person, or who having voted once at any such election, applies at the same election for a ballot paper in his own name."

1660. This definition is adopted in s. 6 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883,<sup>11</sup> which constitutes this offence as felony punishable by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, together with hard labour. This one collateral effect is to avoid the election. It had that effect at Common law on the ground of fraud.<sup>1</sup>

1661. Undue Influence and Personation.—The offence of undue influence is defined in s. 171-C where the prerequisite mens rea is provided by the word “voluntarily” which implies that the act is done with the knowledge that it would have the effect of interfering with the freedom of elections. No similar qualification occurs in defining the offence of personation which is almost bodily copied from the English Act without removing its defects, which are obvious, for, the language of the section as of its prototype is too wide and would include the case of a person who innocently applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person or votes a second time, because it contains no such words as “voluntarily,” “wilfully” or “corruptly.” But these words have been held to qualify the language of the English Act,<sup>2</sup> and the same qualification must be read into the language of s. 171-D.<sup>3</sup> Where therefore, a person was shown to have assisted another to vote but he did not know that he was not entitled to vote, Cave, J. acquitted him, holding that only one corruptly aiding or abetting was intended to be punishable under the Act.<sup>4</sup> So where a person was registered in the voter’s list under a wrong name and he applied for his paper under that name, he was acquitted.<sup>5</sup>

171-E. Whoever commits the offence of bribery shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both ;

Punishment for Bribery.

Provided that bribery by treating shall be punished with fine only.

Explanation.—“Treating” means that form of bribery where the gratification consists in food, drink, entertainment or provision.

1662. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes the punishment for the offences of bribery and treating, defined in s. 171-B where they are explained. The distinction between bribery and treating follows the English Law under which bribery is an indictable offence, while treating is merely an illegal practice and the penalty for it is only half of that attached to bribery.<sup>6</sup> As Willes, J., observed, “Different considerations apply to it than to bribery because men often give and accept drinks—but not money.”<sup>7</sup> The giving of food and drink at election times is not treating unless it is limited to one’s partizans or for the purpose of influencing votes.<sup>8</sup> The whole question depends upon the motive and intention.<sup>9</sup> So Pollock, B said: “The question of corrupt treating must, as it seems to us, be in each case a question of fact. If the refreshments provided were excessive, if the occasions were numerous, and if there were other circumstances calculated to excite suspicion, a corrupt intention might be inferred.”<sup>10</sup> “Treating is sometimes defined to be getting at voters through their mouths and through their stomachs—supplying them with food and giving them drink.”<sup>11</sup>

1663. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted for this offence without the previous sanction of Government as provided in s. 196 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as amended by the Elections Offences and Inquiries Act 1920.<sup>12</sup> The offence is non-cognizable and summons must issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

In case of giver:—

- (1) That the accused gave, offered, agreed to give or offer, or attempted to procure a gratification; or
- (2) That he did so with the object of inducing him or any other person, to stand or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being a candidate or to vote or refrain from voting at an election.

In case of receiver:—

- (1) That the accused obtained or agreed to accept or attempted to obtain a gratification.
- (2) That he did so as a motive for doing what he did not intend to do or as a reward for doing what he would not have otherwise done;
- (3) That he received the gratification for exercising his own electoral right or for inducing or attempting to induce any other person to exercise such right, i.e., the right to stand or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being a candidate or to vote or refrain from voting at an election.

1665. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

In the case of the giver of the bribe:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows—

“That you, on or about the—day of—, at—gave a gratification, to wit—, to—with the object of (inducing him or—to exercise his electoral right) (or reward—ing—for having exercised his electoral right) and thereby committed an offence under s. 171-E of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

“And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

In the case of the acceptor of the bribe:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“That you accepted for yourself or for—a gratification, to wit—, as a reward (for exercising your or his electoral right) (or for inducing or attempting to induce—to exercise his electoral right).

1666. Principle.—Both the English and Indian Law distinguish between bribery, which is sufficient merely to avoid an election and one which is an offence. The question is one of degree, which it is however, for the authority sanctioning a prosecution to take into account. The terms of the section are large enough to comprise any case of bribery and the comparatively venial offence of treating comprised therein.

For further commentary on this offence see s. 171-B.

171-F. Whoever commits the offence of undue influence or personation at an election shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

1667. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes the sentence for the two offences of undue influence and personation defined in ss. 171-C and 171-D respectively. In England, “undue influence” is a misdemeanour punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or to a fine not exceeding £ 200.<sup>1</sup> Personation is, however, a more serious offence, being felony, punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years together with hard labour.<sup>2</sup> A person convicted of this offence would be disqualified from exercising his electoral rights for a period of five years.<sup>3</sup>

1668. Procedure and Practice.—The offence is non-cognizable, and summons must issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a first class Magistrate. Previous sanction of Government is necessary to initiate prosecution.<sup>1</sup> The fact that the abettor is a member of Legislature is no mitigation, but rather an aggravation of the offence.<sup>2</sup>

1669. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

In the case of undue influence :—

- (1) that the accused interfered or attempted to interfere
- (2) with the free exercise of an electoral right
- (3) of any person or persons named
- (4) that he did so voluntarily, i.e., knowingly or corruptly.

In the case of personation :—

- (1) that there was an election to a public body (s. 21 Expl. 3),
- (2) that the accused applied for a voting paper, or
- (3) voted in the name of another voter, or
- (4) having voted once applied again for a voting paper in his own name, or
- (5) that he procured, attempted to procure or abetted the voting by any person in any such way.

1670. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

In the case of undue influence :—

“That you, on or about the——day of——at——voluntarily interfered (or attempted to interfere) with the free exercise of an electoral right, to wit——(here state the act charged) [or threatened——, a candidate (or voter or in whom a candidate or voter) to wit——is interested with injury, to wit——] or [induced (or attempted to induce)——a candidate (or voter) at an election, to wit—— to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested, to wit——will become an object of Divine displeasure (or of spiritual censure)], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171-F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

“And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

In the case of personation :—

“I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“That you, on or about the——day of——at the election, to wit——, applied for a voting paper (or voted) in the name of another person to wit——who is living (or dead), or in a fictitious name to wit——, or in your name after having voted once at the said election and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171-F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

Where the offence falls under the second paragraph of s. 171-D the following should be substituted in place of the second paragraph in the above charge :—

“That you, on or about the——day of——at the election to wit——, abetted (or procured or attempted to procure) the voting by——(specify the act committed and which is punishable under the first para of s. 171-D) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171-F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

1671. This offence may be committed in a variety of ways ; one such way is to abet the wrong personation of a voter in which case the accused, though guilty of the abetment of an offence punishable by s. 465, can now be convicted only of this offence, being a special election offence, so that if he is convicted of the former his conviction could not be altered to one under this section for which previous sanction is a prerequisite.<sup>3</sup>

171-G. Whoever with intent to affect the result of an election makes or publishes any statement purporting to be a statement of fact which is false and which he either knows

1672. Analogous Law.—The offence punishable by this section is the subject of a Special Statute in England<sup>4</sup> to which acknowledgments are made in the Statement of Objects and Reasons.<sup>5</sup>

1673. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be initiated for this offence without the sanction of Government as provided in s. 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The offence is not cognizable and a summons must issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by the Presidency or first class Magistrate.

- (1) That an election was impending.
- (2) That the accused made or published a statement.
- (3) That it purported to be a statement of fact.
- (4) That it related to the personal conduct or character of a candidate.
- (5) That he published it with intent to prejudice his election.
- (6) That it was false.

1675. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

" I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

" That you without the general (or special) authority in writing of—incurred (or authorized) expenses on account of the holding of a public meeting at—(or upon any advertisement, circular or publication Exhibit—, or in any other way whatsoever) for the purpose of promoting (or procuring) the election of —and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171-H of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

" And I hereby direct that you be tried on that charge."

1676. Principle.—This section penalizes the publication of a false statement of fact concerning the personal conduct or character of a candidate. This offence may be committed by any person or association, whether corporate or incorporate.

1677. Meaning of Words.—" A statement of facts," and not merely an opinion.<sup>1</sup> "Personal character or conduct": Only personal attacks are penalized. An attack on the public conduct or character is not punishable under this section, though it may be otherwise, as when it amounts to defamation or slander.

1678. Election Lies.—This section penalizes the publication of election lies concerning the personal conduct and character of a candidate. Two things are essential. It must be a statement of fact and relate to his personal character or conduct. Such was held to be the case where the accused had distributed a leaflet amongst the electors, falsely stating that the firm, of which the plaintiff was a member, had locked out their miners for six weeks.<sup>2</sup> So to say of a temperate man that he had drunk wine, or that there was a very dark passage in his life, and a skeleton in his cupboard which might be exposed, would be punishable because it is a statement of fact and reflects upon his character.<sup>3</sup> The statement that a candidate had been guilty of lying, cowardice and bribery, supported by instances is, of course, an egregious instance of this offence.<sup>4</sup> So are the following statements: that the candidate was living on the profits of cheap foreigners whom he employed at nine pence a day, or that the candidate befriended England's enemies whom he supplied with reliable information and smuggled ammunition.<sup>5</sup>

1679. Limits of the Rule.—On the other hand the section would not be contravened where the statement was a statement, not of a fact but merely an opinion, unless the expression of opinion was supported by instances. It would then be punishable provided it refers to the personal conduct and character of the candidate. Such reference must not be merely inferential, as where it was said that Radical Members of the House of Commons were in correspondence with the enemies,<sup>6</sup> or even where, referring to the opposing candidate, it was said that he only came to the constituency when he wanted votes, which was not held to be a statement as to his personal character but to his character as a public man.<sup>1</sup>

1680. Again, even where a statement is found to be false, the accused is entitled to show that he had reasonable grounds for believing, and did believe it to be true.<sup>2</sup> Lastly, the statement must be made with intent to influence the result of an election, which again postulates that an election was imminent and that the statement was published in the course of an election campaign. Statements published with a view to turn out a candidate from his seat are thus not within the rule.

171-H. Whoever without the general or special authority in writing of a candidate incurs or authorises expenses on account of the holding of any public meeting, or upon any advertisement, circular or publication, or in any other way whatsoever for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of such candidate, shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees :

Illegal payments in connection with an election.

Provided that if any person having incurred any such expenses not exceeding the amount of ten rupees without authority obtains within ten days from the date on which such expenses were incurred the approval in writing of the candidate, he shall be deemed to have incurred such expenses with the authority of the candidate.

1681. Analogous Law.—The author of the Bill cites no precedent in support of this clause.<sup>3</sup> But under English Law certain payments are regarded as illegal, e. g., the use of committee room in a house where intoxicating liquor or refreshment of any kind is sold or supplied to members of a club, society or association other than a permanent political club; or in a public elementary school,<sup>4</sup> the giving or providing cockades, ribbons or marks of distinction;<sup>5</sup> and though, the giving or providing of music, torches, flags and banners is not prohibited, no payment should be made “on account of bands of music, torches flags, banners, cockades, ribbons or other marks of distinction.”<sup>6</sup> Expenditure on advertisement and circular is perfectly legitimate provided that it is not excessive or unusual or is a blind bribery.

1682. This section attacks the abuse by requiring that all expenditure incurred on behalf of a candidate shall be generally or specially authorised by them in writing. The object of this is twofold, First, it secures more correct return of expenditure, and secondly, it prevents corruption. In England, the offences of illegal payment, employment and hiring, subject the offender to penalties, but are not illegal practices and do not affect the election, unless extensive or committed by the candidate, or with his knowledge and consent.<sup>7</sup>

1683. Procedure and Practice.—The offence is non-cognizable and summons may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or magistrate of the first class. Previous sanction of the Government is necessary to initiate prosecution.<sup>8</sup>

171-I. Whoever, being required by any law for the time being in force or any rule having the force of law to keep accounts of expenses incurred at or in connection with an election fails to keep such accounts shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees.

1684. Analogous Law.—This section penalizes the failure to keep accounts. The question what constitutes election expenses, is not answered in this chapter, but it is clear that they must relate to the candidature of a person which only begins on the dissolution or vacancy. It has been so held in England<sup>1</sup> where, however, the rules prescribe the date from which an account of such expenses should be maintained and it is obligatory upon the candidate to do so.

1685. What constitutes the election expense, is another question upon which this chapter is silent. Here again the provisions of the rules on the subject should be maintained. Generally speaking, all expenses necessary for or incidental to an election whether incurred by the candidate himself or by his election agent, canvassers, committeemen, political associations, societies, clubs and other bodies whether corporate or incorporate, are election expenses.<sup>2</sup> Where a candidate had built a room at the back of his house for the use of a political club, and used it as a committee room it was held that a proportionate part of the rent, and the money paid for cleaning coal and gas were election expenses.<sup>3</sup>

1686. It is, however, clear that expenses incurred by a prospective candidate while nursing his constituency are not included in the term. Nor are those incurred after the election.

1687. Limits of Rule.—It has already been stated that the expenses which a prospective candidate incurs while nursing his constituency to make himself acceptable to his constituents being too remote, are not comprised in the term. So the expenses incurred in starting a newspaper three months before the election to advocate his own political views, were held not to be election expenses, being expenses incurred to popularize the candidate's political views.<sup>4</sup> So was the subsidy paid to a newspaper for the same purpose.<sup>5</sup> On the same ground the expenses incurred in improving the electoral roll in the interest of the constituency were excluded.<sup>6</sup>

CHAPTER X.

OF CONTEMPTS OF THE LAWFUL AUTHORITY OF PUBLIC SERVANTS.

1688. Topical Introduction.—One great division of the people, subject to the penal provisions of the Code, is between the public and the public servants. As a necessary part of the administrative machinery of a country, the latter possess certain exceptional rights and privileges. As persons possessing often great power they are necessarily subject to special penalties against its abuse. As such, the last chapter dealt with the delinquencies; this chapter relates to their rights against the public. This Chapter which consists of 19 sections denounces all disobedience to the lawful authority of public servants. As such, it codifies the various pre-existing Regulations on the subject and it lays down in one place all contempts whether they relate to the lawful authority of the Courts of Justice, or Officers of Revenue or of the Police.<sup>1</sup>

1689. These three classes of public servants do not necessarily require the same protective provisions, but, as the authors remarked, in view of the combination of the three functions frequently in the same person in this country and “while the division of labour between the different departments of the Public Service is so imperfect it would be idle to make nice distinctions between those departments in the Penal Code.”<sup>2</sup>

1690. The chapter deals with contempts in its various forms, but its underlying principles are that, in order to subject a person to the penal visitation of its provisions, the order must be legal and its disobedience intentional. These two elements are common to all offences described in this chapter. There are others which form the special pre-requisites of one or more of them, but these will have to be considered under the sections to which they relate.

1691. Of course, the penalties provided in this chapter do not exclude the imposition of other penalties, if the circumstances of the case so warrant. Indeed, the offences here described are really those acts done in contempts of the lawful authority of public servants, which but for the special provision here made, would not be otherwise punishable. They do not, of course, affect other coercive powers possessed by public servants to compel obedience to their orders, whether by arrest or proclamation, attachment or sale of property, or otherwise.

172. Whoever absconds in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue such summons, notice or order, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both; or, if the summons or notice or order is to attend in person or by agent, or to produce a document in a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

[ Document—s. 29.]

1692. Analogous Law.—This section substantially reproduces section 4 of Regulation XI of 1796, which similarly punished evasion of service. The propriety of the word “absconding” was questioned, but as the authors explained it, it is a word used in the corresponding section of the Regulation. Sections 69-74 of the Code of Criminal Procedure lay down the mode of service of summons issued under that Code, while Order XVI of the Code of Civil Procedure<sup>3</sup> provides for the summoning of witnesses in civil cases. The section is generally worded and is not confined in its operation to only parties but extends also to witnesses.

1693. Procedure and Practice.—A prosecution under this section requires the sanction of the public servant concerned.<sup>4</sup> The offence is not cognizable,

(1) Note F.
(2) Note F.

(3) Act V of 1908.
(4) S. 195, Cr. P. C.

and summons must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate, and may be tried summarily.

1694. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That a summons, notice or order had been issued.
- (2) That it was issued by a public servant,
- (3) Who was legally competent to issue it.
- (4) That it was issued to be served on the accused.
- (5) That the accused had absconded to avoid being served.

1695. The second clause deals with the aggravated form of the same offence, and it requires for its proof the following additional circumstances, namely :—

- (6) That the process required the attendance of the accused either personally or by his agent, or required the production of a document by him, and
- (7) That such attendance or production was to be made in a Court of Justice.

1696. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—, absconded to avoid service of summons (or notice or order) proceeding from—(name the public servant and state his office) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 172 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1697. Principle.—This section implies that the absconding was with the intention of evading service, which again implies, that the absconder knew that a process had been issued, and that he was attempting to defeat it by his flight. Absconding in order to avoid service is thus an offence of the same kind as disobeying a summons after its service. As in the one case, so in the other, the intention is to resist the process of Court. In the one case there is active disobedience, in the other case there is a passive resistance, but the intention and object is in each case the same.

1698. Meaning of Words.—“ Absconds ” : It does not necessarily imply change of place but absconding may be effected by concealment.<sup>1</sup> It must be with the intention of avoiding service. The summons, notice or order must then be addressed to the person whose attendance is required and who absconds to avoid its service. “ Summons notice or order ” : This does not include a warrant which is not an order served on the accused. It is simply an order to the police to arrest him.<sup>2</sup> “ Legally competent as such public servant ” : Competency, and not the propriety of the summons or order determines the offence.

1699. Absconding to Avoid Service.—In order to prove the commission of an offence under this section, four things must be established ; (i) that summons, notice or order had been issued ; (ii) that the public servant issuing it was legally competent to issue it ; (iii) that the accused knew, or had reason to believe that it had been issued ; and (iv) he must have absconded to evade it. To avoid the service of process, which has not issued, is no offence under this Code,<sup>3</sup> nor is it enough that the process had been issued, if the accused did not know anything about it. The essence of the crime consists of intentional evasion of service, and there must, therefore, be both knowledge of the process and absconding to avoid it. The word “ absconds ” is here used to imply concealment. It does not necessarily imply that a person leaves the place in which he lives. Its etymological and its ordinary sense are to hide one’s self : and it matters not whether a person departs from a place or remains in it, if he conceals himself, nor does the term apply only to the commencement of the concealment. If a person having concealed himself before process issues, continues to do so after it has issued, he absconds.<sup>4</sup> The term is similarly used in English Law of persons who go out of the way in order to avoid a legal process.

1700. But a person cannot be said to abscond if he merely intended to get rid of the process server, e.g., where he refused to accept service, abused the process server and went inside his house.<sup>1</sup>

1701. Knowledge Essential.—Moreover, absconding merely is not an offence punishable under this section. In order to amount to an offence, a person must have absconded in order to avoid service. The absconding must be with a purpose. And, as Turner, C. J., observed, this implies that the absconder knows, or at least has reason to believe, that the process had issued. He may abscond to avoid the issue of process; and this would not be an offence under this section. But “when he knows or has reason to believe that it has issued, he may be unwilling to show contempt of the authority of the Court or officer who has issued it, and may comply with it, or so conduct himself that service may be effected; but he can hardly be said to be guilty of contempt of authority if he does not know, and has no reason to believe, the authority has been exercised, not to the absconding to prevent the service of a process, if he does not know, nor has reason to believe, that it has issued.”<sup>2</sup> Moreover, such knowledge on the part of the accused cannot be presumed, from the mere issue of process. It must be established by the prosecution, upon whom lies the burden of proving it.<sup>3</sup>

1702. “Summons, Notice or Order”.—Again, the section only applies to contempts in respect of “summons, notice or order.” A warrant for the arrest of a person is not, therefore, within these terms. It is no doubt an “order,” but then it is not an order addressed to the person to be addressed, but to the police to arrest and produce him before the Court.<sup>4</sup>

1703. The “order,” the evasion of which is here condemned is not an order relating to a person but an order addressed to any person, and one which will only take effect from the date of its service on him. There are a large number of orders which are perfectly legal without any special service on the person affected. A copy of such an order may be ordered to be served on him ex majori cautela, but evasion of its service is not an offence punishable under this section. On the other hand, there are orders which are binding on one, only from the date of service. It is to prevent the evasion of service of an order of this kind the section was enacted. Such an order may, for instance, be passed both under the Code of Civil as well as Criminal Procedure. Under the former, such an order may be a prohibitory order, or one for a temporary injunction<sup>5</sup> or an attachment of property.<sup>6</sup> It may be an order in execution. And, indeed, as a rule all orders passed in a civil proceeding affecting a party to a suit or proceeding require to be served on the party to be thereby affected. So under the Code of Criminal Procedure an order for removal of nuisance<sup>7</sup> requires to be served on the person against whom it is made, in a manner therein provided for service of a summons.<sup>8</sup> So again, an order concerning a dispute as to immovable property requires to be served on the person to be bound thereby.<sup>9</sup> In all such cases an evasion would be punishable as an offence under this section.

1704. But in the case of warrants, whether of the Civil,<sup>10</sup> or of the Criminal Court,<sup>11</sup> the section has, as already remarked, no application. This does not mean that in such a case the party sought to be arrested can evade service with impunity ; but in case of disobedience, the procedure to be resorted to is only that which the law lays down to punish such recalcitrants. Thus the procedure, in the case of a warrant issued by a Criminal Court, is by proclamation and attachment,<sup>1</sup> and similar coercive procedure is prescribed by other Acts.

1705. Again, the summons, notice or order must have been of a public servant legally competent to issue it. It may be, as in the case above supposed, supererogatory and even improper, but it must not be illegal. For, there can be no contempt to disobey an illegal order, a fortiori to evade it. So where the police reported that the trees of certain persons including the accused Hiralal overhang a certain house endangering its safety against thieves, the Magistrate thereupon issued an order on Hiralal and the rest to lop off the overhanging branches of their trees, or show cause. The police wanted Hiralal to sign a receipt for this order, which he refused to do. He was prosecuted under this section, and it was held that both the order as well as the request made for a receipt, were illegal, and that the accused therefore could not be convicted.<sup>2</sup> So the conviction of the absconder was quashed where the summons issued for his appearance had mentioned no place for his attendance.<sup>3</sup> been explained under the last section (§§ 1702, 1704). Here, again, the knowledge that it is a process from a public servant legally competent to issue it is material.

1708. Procedure and Practice.—The sanction of the Court or public servant whose process was abused is required to initiate a prosecution under this section.<sup>1</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Magistrate, Presidency, First or Second Class, and may be tried summarily. The question whether what the accused did amounts to prevention or not is ordinarily a question of fact.<sup>2</sup>

1709. Proof.—The points then requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the process in question was a summons, notice or order or a proclamation.
- (2) That it was issued by a public servant.
- (3) That he had authority to issue it.
- (4) That if a summons, notice or order, it was issued for service on some one.
- (5) That the accused knew it.
- (6) That he either prevented its service or removed it from any place to which it had been lawfully affixed: or that he prevented the making of the proclamation.
- (7) That he did so intentionally.

To which the following aggravating facts may be added:—

- (8) That the process or proclamation required the attendance of the accused either in person or by agent, or the production of a document, and
- (9) That such process or proclamation was to attend or to produce the document in a Court of Justice.

1710. Prevention of Process.—This section refers to the prevention of service of process or issue of a proclamation by the lawful authority of a public servant. Here, as under the last section, three things are the necessary prerequisites of the offence, namely, (i) prevention, (ii) intention, and (iii) lawful authority in the public servant.

1711. As regards prevention of service, two things are essential. The prevention must have reference to the service, and the accused must have prevented it. Prevention may be by a direct act or by evasion and concealment,<sup>3</sup> but a mere refusal of the accused to receive a Summons to attend Court, issued under the Codes of Civil or Criminal Procedure is not punishable under this section, since a refusal to accept service amounts to service and cannot therefore be construed as prevention of service.<sup>4</sup> If, therefore, after the service is effected in the manner directed by law, the accused throws down the summons, it may be in contempt of the authority issuing it, he could not be dealt with under this section, as such an act does not amount to prevention of the service, which is all that the section visits with penal consequences.<sup>5</sup> And since the object of the section is to punish only such prevention as interferes with the completion of service, even the refusal to receive a summons is not an offence under this section, if its actual delivery was not legally necessary to complete its service. So since the mere tender of a summons is sufficient under both the Civil<sup>6</sup> as well as the Criminal Procedure Codes,<sup>7</sup> a refusal to receive does not expose one to the penalty of this section.<sup>8</sup> So, again, while the person receiving a summons is enjoined to “sign a receipt therefor on the back of the other duplicate,”<sup>9</sup> still this is a precautionary measure, intended to afford evidence of service, and is no part of the form required to complete it, for which a mere tender of one of the duplicates is sufficient.<sup>10</sup> It therefore follows, that the refusal to acknowledge service is not an offence under this section.<sup>1</sup> So the refusal of a person illegally required to execute a recognisance for his appearance before a Magistrate does not constitute such prevention as is here contemplated. This was pointed out by Wilson, J., in 1886, in a case, since reported,<sup>2</sup> in which the Collector had appointed certain servants of a recalcitrant Zemindar as special constables, in which capacity they refused to serve, whereupon they were tried and convicted under this section. But it was held, as indeed it is only too obvious, that "the facts and the charge have nothing to do with one another, no single point of connection," and the proceedings were accordingly quashed.<sup>3</sup>

1712. Analogous Law.—This section does not supersede the provisions of the several local Acts, which make special provisions for the punishment of such disobedience.<sup>4</sup> In such cases, the preferable course would, of course, be to punish the offenders under the local Acts rather than under this section (§ 79).

1713. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be initiated under this section without sanction of the public servant concerned.<sup>5</sup> An offence under this section is not cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate, and may be tried summarily.

- (1) That the accused was legally bound to attend in person or by an agent,
- (2) That such obligation was in obedience to a summons, notice, order or proclamation.
- (3) Which proceeded from a public servant.
- (4) Who was legally competent, as such public servant, to issue it.
- (5) That the accused omitted to attend or departed as stated in paragraph 2.
- (6) That he did so intentionally.<sup>6</sup>

To which may be proved the following fact in aggravation—

- (7) That the summons, etc., was for attendance in a Court of Justice.

1715. When Non-attendance is an Offence.—This section creates intentional non-attendance in obedience to a summons, notice or order, an offence. But in order to amount to an offence, the section requires that the several particulars should be fulfilled. In the first place, the summons must require the presence of the accused which must be compulsory and not merely optional. A notice to a revenue defaulter is not such a summons.<sup>1</sup> Again, there must be a summons appointing a certain time and place for a person's attendance. It must have been issued by a public servant "legally competent, as such public servant to issue the same."<sup>2</sup> Then the omission must have been intentional.<sup>3</sup>

1716. Requirements of a Summons, Notice or Order.—A summons, notice, or order, ordering a person to attend, should be clear and specific in its terms as to the title of the Court, the place at which, the day and the time of the day when, the attendance of the person is required, and it should contain a direction that such person is not to leave the Court without leave, and if the case in which he has been summoned is adjourned, without ascertaining the date to which it is adjourned.<sup>4</sup> A summons must, in fact, fulfil all the requirements of the law. If it is in its form and substance defective, the accused is entitled to take advantage of it and say that it was not a legal summons and that it was not one which he was bound to obey. If, therefore, it was required to be signed by the public servant issuing it, it must have been so signed. If it was required to be sealed, it must have been duly sealed and an omission in this respect has been held to vitiate a conviction for non-attendance under this section.<sup>5</sup> Again, the summons, notice or order must be directed to the person, ordering him to appear. Cases have been cited before, in which it was held that a warrant is not comprised in the terms "summons, notice or order" as a warrant is not addressed to the person to be arrested, but to another to effect his arrest. (§ 1704). The disobedience of a warrant is, of course, not an offence punishable under this section. And so where the tahsildar, in a mutation case, issued an order to a peon directing him to produce the accused in Court to support his objection to a claim for pre-emption and the accused refused to attend, whereupon he was prosecuted and convicted under this section, it was held that the conviction could not be sustained as the order had been directed to the peon and not to the accused.<sup>6</sup> The summons, notice or order must be in writing if it is so required by law.<sup>7</sup> Otherwise it may be oral. A verbal order, given to a witness by a Court to attend on a particular day at a particular hour, is sufficient, so, after a witness is before Court, the disobedience of an order directing him to appear at an adjourned hearing would be punishable under this section.<sup>8</sup>

1717. Certain Time and Place.—Again, the specification of time and place are the most essential parts of a legal precept, and omission to mention either is an incurable defect in a summons, notice or order rendering it impossible of enforcement.<sup>9</sup> A summons, merely directing that a person was to attend on a certain day, without specifying the hour when and the place where he was to attend, cannot, therefore, support a conviction for disobedience under this section.<sup>10</sup> The fact that the public servant has a fixed place and hours of business is no answer to a defect in the summons to specify those particulars. For the accused is not bound to infer, but must be told the time and place of his attendance. Moreover, the time mentioned must be such as when the Court actually requires the attendance of a person or party. The conventional mention of 10 o'clock of the day, usually found printed on summonses, is not only useless but misleading, for it is well-known that, in no part of the country is public business transacted before 11 and a person directed to attend at 10 A.M. is well aware of it. Consequently, he could not be convicted for disobedience under this section, if he attended at the usual hours in spite of the printed legend to attend at 10 o'clock, for it could not then be said that his omission was "intentional". A recognizance executed by a party to appear, whenever called upon, does not comply with the requirements of law requiring the specification of time.<sup>1</sup> So, while a verbal order to a party or a witness to appear at an adjourned hearing is not illegal, such an order must specify the time at which his attendance is required. An order to appear when required is, therefore, wholly illegal.<sup>2</sup> So is also an order to a person to appear within a certain number of days.<sup>3</sup> Again, the place where a witness is summoned to attend, must be in British India. A Magistrate cannot order a person to appear before him at a place outside British territory. "If the Magistrate had ordinarily power to summon witnesses to attend at a place outside British India, the act of disobedience would then be done in foreign territory, and amount to an offence, over which he would have no jurisdiction."<sup>4</sup>

1718. As a warrant is something quite distinct from a summons, notice or order (§§ 1702, 1704), a judgment-debtor, escaping from custody under a warrant in execution of the decree of a Civil Court, cannot be dealt with under this section.<sup>5</sup>

1719. No Disobedience Without Personal Service.—The highly penal provisions of this section cannot be put into force, unless a person is personally served with the summons, notice or order.<sup>6</sup> But this is not a necessary pre-requisite, for, if it were, it would be easy to evade this section by evading personal service. What is meant, however, is this that a person cannot be said to be guilty of intentional disobedience, unless knowledge was clearly brought home to him that his presence was required by a public servant at a certain time and place, which a substituted service may not have done. But, even in the latter case, it may be possible to bring home such knowledge, if it is shown that the summons was affixed in a conspicuous part of his house, which the accused must have seen. The posting up of a proclamation on a place temporarily used for making collections of rent and abandoned as soon as the collection season was over is not such a place at a time when the person to be served was known to be residing elsewhere.<sup>7</sup> It is on the prosecution to prove that the non-attendance of the accused was intentional. For that purpose it is on them to show that the accused had knowledge of the summons and of the time and place mentioned therein in spite of which he did not attend.<sup>8</sup>

1720. In any case, there must have been a legal service, for, if there was no legal service, there can be no offence under this section.<sup>9</sup> There could be no legal service, when a summons, required to be delivered or tendered to a witness, is merely shown to him.<sup>10</sup> Indeed, as a matter of ordinary precaution, this is a course advisable even when there is no express provision of law in enjoining the delivery of a written order for, unless a written memorandum is made, or is left with the accused, he might plead forgetfulness as an excuse for his non-attendance.<sup>11</sup>

1721. It is perhaps needless to add that the service of a summons addressed to one person may be validly refused by another, even though he may be a relation or an agent of the person to be served. A person so refusing cannot be proceeded against under this section.<sup>12</sup>

1722. Process must be Legal.—Thirdly, the summons, notice or order must be legal, that is to say, not only must the public servant issuing it have jurisdiction to issue a summons, notice or order, but he must have had jurisdiction to issue the summons, notice or order, in consequence of which the non-attendance is complained of.<sup>1</sup> The question whether a summons so issued was or was not within the competency of its author must naturally depend upon examination of the authority under which it purports to have been issued. For the right to compel attendance is not a necessary incident of every public office, nor is it a power possessed by every public servant. Such a power was denied to the Chairman of a Municipality appointed under a Bombay Act,<sup>2</sup> and a Mamlatdar, acting under the Bombay Land Revenue Code, was held to have been under the same incapacity.<sup>3</sup> The Tahsildars in the Punjab are not empowered to summon persons called Munsiffs, who are persons appointed to prepare and attest a list of cattle for the purpose of distributing revenue over waste lands.<sup>4</sup> Nor have the Tahsildars power to order Lambardars of a village in his Tahsil to appear for the purpose of appointing Chawkidars, and the fact that they are to nominate them does not imply a power in the Tahsildars, to summon them for the purpose.<sup>5</sup>

1723. Public servants are sometimes empowered to summon witnesses only in certain cases, and under certain circumstances. In such cases, the test of the legality of their action must depend upon fulfilment of the qualifying conditions. For instance, a second class Magistrate, invested with the powers of a Mahalkari is empowered to dismiss a village officer after investigation,<sup>6</sup> and for that purpose, he is empowered to have “the same authority as a Magistrate in compelling the attendance of parties and witnesses, and the production of papers, and in taking evidence.”<sup>7</sup> Where, therefore, a Mahalkari issued a summons to the accused, a Kulkarni of the village, to attend to explain why he had failed to have certain books sealed with the Mahalkari’s seal, and on his failing to attend, he was convicted under this section, it was held that he could not be so convicted, because the purpose for which the summons had been issued did not justify the Mahalkari to summon the accused.<sup>8</sup> So where a Sub-Inspector of Police summoned the surety of an absconding accused, to admonish and urge him to produce him, and he, having been told the purpose why he was wanted by the constable who served the summons upon him, refused to attend, whereupon he was prosecuted under this section, it was held that the Inspector had no authority to issue a summons for the appearance of accused for the purpose for which he wanted him, and that he had only power under s. 160 of the Procedure Code to enforce attendance of persons in cases in which he was making investigation under Chapter XIV of that Code.<sup>9</sup> So where in a case, instituted upon complaint, the District Magistrate warned the complainant to appear on a certain day at 10 A.M., failing which his complaint would be dismissed, he failed to appear and his complaint was consequently dismissed, it was held that, since there was no unconditional order for the complainant’s appearance, nor would the issue of such an order have been legal, his failure to attend was not punishable under this section.<sup>10</sup> The Civil Court has the power to appoint persons to be arbitrators in a case pending before it, but that does not confer upon them the power to enforce the attendance of persons so appointed much less to prosecute them for an offence under this section for disobedience.<sup>11</sup>

1724. These cases are sufficient to show that the competency of the author of the summons must be either apparent, or clearly established by the prosecution.

It may be that a person is empowered to issue summonses in one capacity, but that does not enlarge his authority to issue summons, while acting in another capacity and for a different purpose. And, even when acting within his authority, a person could not issue a summons except for a lawful purpose. For instance, a summons to take away a bundle of puttahs for distribution is not a legal summons.<sup>1</sup> But there is nothing against one officer directing a person to appear before another officer. Such is, indeed, the case in cases committed for trial to the Court of Sessions or the High Court, in which the committing Magistrate directs the witness to appear before another Court. But even in such cases, the legality of the order will, of course, depend upon the power of the Court ordering the summons and not on that before whom it is returnable.<sup>2</sup>

1725. Intentional Non-attendance.—Lastly, the non-attendance must be shown to have been intentional, and this must be done by the prosecution. It is not merely non-attendance, but non-attendance which amounts to wilful disobedience that law visits with its penalty.<sup>3</sup> A person ordered to attend Court at a stated hour may be unable to do so, because he was detained by another Court. He could not then be convicted under this section.<sup>4</sup> So it is sometimes customary for a person while being served to explain to the process-server his inability to attend. He could not then be convicted of intentional non-attendance, whatever other course the Court might then think fit to adopt to enforce his attendance. So, where the accused was summoned to give evidence before a Settlement Officer and it appeared that he had at the time of service stated to the process-server his inability to be present owing to the expected arrival of a marriage-procession of his relative—a fact which the process-server omitted to mention to the Settlement Officer, it was held that the absence could not be said to have been “intentional.”<sup>5</sup>

1726. The fact that a person did not attend after receipt of summons and had not sent timely intimation of his inability to attend, is not sufficient to fasten the guilt of intentional disobedience upon him. For he may have been both unable to attend as also to communicate with the Court. It is, therefore, in every case necessary that the Court, sanctioning a prosecution, should give the party accused, an opportunity of explaining his absence, and in any case, before he could be legally convicted, there must be evidence on record to show that the accused had been guilty of intentional disobedience,<sup>6</sup> which again cannot be presumed, but must be legally and sufficiently proved.<sup>7</sup> The mere production of the summons to the accused, with an endorsement of service, is not sufficient proof of service, in the absence of evidence of the officer who is said to have served the summons.<sup>8</sup> What is required to be proved is that it was brought to the knowledge of the accused that he was required to attend, and that he intentionally omitted to do so.

1727. Ordinarily, a person required to be present in person, cannot appear by a pleader or agent, but, if he does so, it may be then a question whether his personal non-attendance was due to intentional disobedience. Where, for instance, in a case the accused had been summoned to appear before a Magistrate, and he thereupon sent his agent to appear and apply for his personal exemption, while he himself proceeded to apply against the case to the High Court, for which the Magistrate considered him “doubly guilty of contempt of Court,” the High Court upset his conviction, holding that the accused had appeared, though not in person in compliance with the summons of the Magistrate, and that he could not, therefore, be accused of intentional disobedience.<sup>9</sup> So, where an accused was summoned to appear at 10 o'clock in Court, and he did then appear, but after waiting for about an hour and being told that the Magistrate may not come till noon, he left the Court, and the latter had him prosecuted for an offence under this section. But the High Court quashed his conviction holding that a person ordered to appear at a certain hour was not bound to await the convenience of the person summoning him more than for a reasonable time, and that an hour is under such circumstances a reasonable time,<sup>1</sup> though two or three minutes would have been under the circumstances wholly unreasonable.<sup>2</sup> But this was a case where the Magistrate was absent, and as the Court took care to point out, the case would have been different, if the Magistrate had been present, and engaged in some other business, or if it were shown that the accused was aware that there was any other such cause for the delay in taking up his case as he was in reason bound to submit to.<sup>3</sup> These were, however, cases in which the summons did not direct as to how long one was to stay in Court, or that the person summoned was not to depart without the leave of the Court. But even in such a case, it is apprehended that the rule would not be wholly different. For a person could not be expected to sacrifice his business and convenience to await his call indefinitely.

1728. Of course, such cases must be approached in the light of reason. For there may be non-compliance with the letter of the law, but it is not the letter, but the substance that is in such cases to be looked to. Suppose, a person were ordered to appear before a Magistrate on a certain day at a certain hour, and he failed to appear; but on that day the Magistrate was absent from the station. Could he be convicted for not having complied with his summons? It was held not. As the Court observed: "The object of the summons was the meeting between the two. How could this object be realised unless the person summoning was present to meet the person summoned? Would it not have been futile even if the latter turned up at the fixed place? But the law compels no man to do that which is futile or fruitless. Lex neminem cogit ad vana seu inutilia peragenda. No doubt, in this case the accused did not say that he failed to go to Gooty because of the Tahsildar's absence. Assuming that he intended to disobey the summons, such intention alone is, of course, not punishable under section 174, or under any other provision of law."<sup>4</sup>

1729. Cumulative Penalties.—When an act is punishable both under this section as well as under a local Act, there cannot be a double conviction both under the Code as well as the local Act. In such a case, the preferable course is to punish under the local Act (§ 79). Again, where a person has already given a recognizance for his appearance on a certain day it is not usual to fine him for non-appearance before the Court in addition to escheating his recognizance,<sup>5</sup> though of course, there is nothing in law to prevent the adoption of such a course.<sup>6</sup>

1730. No Offence.—It has already been seen that the mere refusal to receive a summons does not amount to prevention punishable under this section. It has also been seen that any reasonable excuse for non-attendance is a sufficient answer, e.g., attendance in another Court (§ 1725), illness, though it need not be such as wholly incapacitates a person from attending<sup>7</sup> late service on a person living at a distance<sup>8</sup> or the missing of the train, or of the conveyance or the like. So where the Magistrate did not act in that capacity, but in his capacity as Secretary of the Cantonment Committee, a refusal to attend is not punishable under this section.<sup>9</sup> A citation to a person to pay or to appear being a conditional writ, its disobedience is not punishable under this section.<sup>10</sup>

1731. Analogous Law.—As regards the sentence here prescribed, this section compares favourably with the corresponding provision of the English law which authorizes a much severer punishment, namely, imprisonment for one year or unlimited fine or both.<sup>1</sup> The Law Commissioners instanced the case of a man suborned to commit perjury by a great bribe, and it was suggested that the fine under this section should be unlimited. The principle is that “no man ought ever to gain by breaking the Law.” So the Law Commissioners wrote: “The principle appears to us applicable to a party bribed not to appear upon a summons or order, or not to produce some document of importance, as well as to a party bribed to give false evidence, since justice may be defeated by a witness failing to appear to give evidence, which is essential and which he alone can give, or by failing to produce an essential document, as well as by a witness giving false evidence. We see no greater probability of the power being abused in such cases than in many others in which the fine is unlimited.”<sup>2</sup> This eventually led to the addition of paragraph 2 and the enhanced penalty therein provided.

1732. Section 180 of the Code of Criminal Procedure prescribes a summary procedure enabling the Court to punish such contempts, but a procedure under which is optional.<sup>3</sup> Where the Court elects to proceed under it, its record must be prepared as required by section 481 of the Procedure Code. It may also imprison a recalcitrant person to imprisonment as laid down in s. 485. But in every case of conviction or sentence, the accused has the right of appeal.<sup>4</sup>

1733. It will be observed that in the case of a Court other than the High Court the power of the Court to punish is confined only to contempts committed in its view or presence. It cannot punish for contempts not so committed. Such offences must be tried and disposed of by a Court other than that in respect of whom the contempt was committed.<sup>5</sup>

1734. Of course, in this respect the High Courts possess plenary powers of punishing contempts whether committed in its presence or otherwise (§ 83).

1735. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution for an offence under this section can be initiated without sanction, as required by section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The offence is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Procedure Code; or if not committed in a Court, it is triable by a Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

1736. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused was legally bound to produce or deliver up any document to any public servant or to a Court of Justice.
- (2) That he omitted to produce or deliver it up.
- (3) That he did so intentionally.

(5) Seshayya, 13 M. 24.

1737. Intentional Non-production of Document.—The intentional non-production of a document by a person legally bound to produce it is an offence under this section, and not an offence under section 174 of the Code of Civil Procedure.<sup>1</sup> The latter section only applies to a witness, whereas the present section is general and applies to all alike. In all cases of contempt, the Court cannot punish the offender without recording the facts constituting the offence with the statement (if any) made by the offender as well as the finding and sentence.<sup>2</sup> This is the very minimum that the Court, sentencing an offender for contempt, is called upon to record. If, therefore, he fines a person without preparing any record of the facts and the statement of the offender, his sentence cannot be maintained.<sup>3</sup>

1738. In order to constitute an offence under this section, it is necessary for the prosecution to show that the accused was legally bound to produce or deliver up the document which he was called upon to produce or deliver up. This implies that the public servant calling for the production of the document was legally competent to order its production. A Sub-Registrar has no such power. Where, therefore, a Sub-registrar called upon a person to produce the original document which was registered in his office to enable him to compare it with the copy of the deed in the Registration Office Register, which, it was suspected, had been tampered with, it was held that his refusal to produce it did not constitute an offence under this section, as he was not legally bound to produce it.<sup>4</sup> So there is no law which compels an accused person undergoing his trial to produce a document incriminating himself, and his refusal could not, therefore, be punished under this section.<sup>5</sup>

1739. A person may be legally bound to produce a document and yet there may not have been an intentional omission on his part to produce it. Where, for instance, the Court issued a summons for the production of the account-books of a partnership to a junior member of a joint Hindu family carrying on business as a partnership, and it was shown that the father was the manager of the family, he was held justified in failing to produce them.<sup>6</sup>

176. Whoever, being legally bound to give any notice or to furnish information on any subject to any public servant, as such, intentionally omits to give such notice or to furnish such information in the manner and at the time required by law, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both ;

or, if the notice or information required to be given respects the commission of an offence, or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Act III of 1888) ss. 473, 155 (1), (2), 187; The Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894) s. 10 (2).

1741. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be initiated under this section without sanction of the Court or public servant concerned.<sup>1</sup> While a witness is under a legal obligation to answer questions put to him in the witness box, the Court should not sanction his prosecution if he refused to answer questions which had absolutely no bearing on the facts of the case, though the Court might, in such a case, take action under s. 480 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.<sup>2</sup> The offence is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable and not compoundable. It is triable by a Magistrate Presidency, first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

1742. Proof.—This section has nothing whatever to do with the conduct of accused persons in Court. They cannot be prosecuted under this section if they refuse to reply to questions put to them by Court.<sup>3</sup> The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused was under legal obligation to furnish information to any public servant.
- (2) That he omitted to furnish it.
- (3) That his omission was intentional.

To which may be added the following aggravating circumstances :—

- (4) That the notice or information was as respects the commission of an offence ;
- (5) or was required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or
- (6) for the apprehension of an offender.

1743. Charge.—The offence being a “ summons ” case no charge need be framed, but should one become necessary, it should distinctly set forth the particular offence in respect of which the accused either omitted to give information, or gave information which he knew to be false ; and it should appear precisely what his duty it was in the matter.<sup>4</sup>

1744. Principle.—The obligation to assist public servants has to some extent been cast in all countries upon the public in certain cases. Where it is so, it becomes a public duty, the dereliction of which is punishable as a crime. In order to bring an offender within the penal visitation of this section, two things are essential—there must be a duty, and there must be its intentional non-performance, which, again, must have led to some injury, for, if the information withheld has otherwise reached the public servant, the object of the section having been attained, the accused could not be convicted for non-disclosure.<sup>5</sup>

1745. Meaning of Words.—“ In the manner and at the time required by law ” : Not only must the information be given, but it must be given opportunely. “ Respects the commission of an offence,” e.g., as required by section 44 of the Procedure Code. “ For the purpose of preventing ” : This may either mean that the nature of the information required had been bespoke, as where a subordinate police officer, on patrol only, is told to report any apprehended breach of the peace ; or it may be a duty independently cast upon some section of the public, as it has been by section 45 (f) of the Procedure Code.

1746. When Omission to Inform is an Offence.—An omission postulates legal obligation and knowledge, for there can be no omission when there is no legal obligation<sup>6</sup> and knowledge.<sup>7</sup> And a person is not bound to go out of his way to secure it. For he is under no legal obligation to do so. All he is called upon to do is to impart it to the public servant if he possesses it. In order, then, to make him liable for non-disclosure, it is incumbent upon the prosecution to show that he was legally bound to disclose, and that he had the information which he could have, but for reasons of his own, did not communicate. The mere fact that overtures were made to one to join in a dacoity does not show that he was possessed of the information about the dacoity which subsequently took place. If A goes up to B and says "Let us go and commit a dacoity" and B refuses, could it be said that B was aware of the dacoity which A committed with the help of C? It does not necessarily follow. For B may believe that his refusal to join A would deter him from committing any dacoity at all, and at any rate, it could not be said that B knew of any dacoity merely because there was a proposal to commit one with his assistance.<sup>1</sup>

1747. The notice or information contemplated in this section is naturally notice or information of a definite character, having a credible origin and such as may probably be conducive to the apprehension or prevention of crime. The section does not refer to vague floating gossips in which every bazar abounds. For while it is the duty to give information to a public servant, it is a duty which cannot be discharged perfunctorily by giving any information at haphazard, though it may turn out to be false, for the giving of such information is in itself a crime under the next section. As Prinsep, J., remarked in a case: "The object of the law is clearly that the earliest information should be communicated by those who are in the best position to obtain the same, or who, from their connection with the land, are in some authority and should accordingly be made responsible for this duty."<sup>2</sup>

1748. If, for instance, a man were found with his throat cut in a field, it may be fairly presumed that he died there, and the owner or occupier of field would then be under an obligation to report the occurrence, the omission to do which may well expose him to the risk of being condemned under this section.<sup>3</sup> In such a case it is not necessary that the land-holder should have been an eye-witness to the deed. If that were the law, it would defeat its own object, for it would then take away all responsibility from those who were not actual eye-witnesses to a crime. So, in another case, the accused, who were Lambardars and Chowkidars of a village, were informed that one Mt. A had disappeared from the village, and that her body had afterwards been seen in a certain stream; whereupon the accused, after consulting together what report should be made at the thana, decided that the Chowkidar should merely report the fact that the woman had disappeared and not mention that her corpse had been seen in the stream. It was held that the discovery of a dead body in the stream under the circumstances could not but have given the accused reason to believe that her death was due to foul play, and that, under the circumstances, they were bound to report all they had seen and heard, and that their omission to report it exposed them to the penalty of this section.<sup>4</sup> The duty cast upon owners or occupiers of land under section 45 of the Procedure Code does not extend to the owners or occupiers of houses in a village, so that an omission by an owner of a house to give information of a sudden or unnatural death is not offence under this section.<sup>5</sup>

1749. Who are Legally Bound.—Again, the section only applies to those who are legally bound to give information. Under s. 46 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act, the landlord is bound to inform Revenue officials of the excess collections of rent on his requisitioning him to do so. Consequently, the mere fact that the accused had collected such rent without apprising the revenue officials of the same does not expose him to the penalty of this offence.<sup>6</sup> Nor should a mere non-compliance with a technicality expose a person to the dangers of this section.<sup>7</sup> The word "legal" here means under a legal enactment and not merely under some rules framed under an enactment.<sup>8</sup> So where the accused, a Zaildar in the Punjab, was prosecuted for failing to give information of two cases of house-breaking, and it was urged against him that he was bound "to report heinous crimes to the police and Magistrate" under the rules framed by the Financial Commissioner under the Punjab Land Revenue Act, it was held by the Chief Court that having regard to section 43 of the Code, though a Zaildar is required, by virtue of the rule referred to, to report, such rule does not cast upon him a legal duty to report, such as is imposed by a direct and express enactment of the Legislature, so that he can be held merely as a Zaildar to be "legally bound to give information" of the commission of the heinous offence.<sup>1</sup> Even when a duty is cast upon a person to inform, it must be strictly construed. The accused, who were Lambardars of a village, were convicted under this section of having omitted to give information that one D had released a robber on taking a bribe. The accused denied that they had knowledge of the release until the police came to investigate the case. The Magistrate did not find that they had any knowledge, but convicted them, holding that as they were Lambardars of the village they could not be absolved from liability. But it was held by the Chief Court that the finding was insufficient to support a conviction under this section, for there was no finding that the accused were aware of the release of the robber, and that they were bound to give information of it, and that so far as regards the police-man, the accused were not bound to report about his having taken a bribe which was a bailable offence;<sup>2</sup> or of the release of the robber, which was not the passage of the robber through their village which they were under the statutory liability to report.<sup>3</sup>

1750. Every Lambardar of a village, on becoming aware of the commission of the offence of house-breaking by night, whether with or without theft, is, like every other person, legally bound by section 44 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in the absence of reasonable excuse (the burden of proving which lies upon him) to give information of the same forthwith to the nearest police-officer or Magistrate, and if he intentionally omits to give such information he is, subject to proof of a reasonable excuse, guilty of an offence punishable under this section. But when there are several lambardars, and one of them to the knowledge of the others, directs the village Chowkidars to make a report at the thana, it would be difficult to find that any of them had intentionally omitted to give the information prescribed by law, or that there was no reasonable excuse for not giving it, if the Chowkidar had disobeyed the order.<sup>4</sup>

1751. A Karnam is legally bound to furnish true information regarding the cultivation in his village.<sup>5</sup> But a Karnam who omitted to furnish cultivation-accounts of his village in obedience to the orders of the Revenue Inspector was only guilty of departmental disobedience. He could not be convicted under this section.<sup>6</sup>

1752. The accused person is under no legal obligation to reply to questions put to him by the Court. He cannot, therefore, be convicted of this offence for refusal.<sup>7</sup> No one is personally bound to furnish information to a Sub-Registrar regarding the documents which it is his duty to register. So where a Sub-Registrar suspected an old document and thereupon summoned the accused to appear before him and make a statement concerning the document which the accused refused to do, it was held that as the accused was under no legal obligation to make a statement as desired by the Sub-Registrar, he could not be convicted of an offence under this section.<sup>8</sup>

1753. And since the object of the section is not so much to punish delinquents as to assist public servants in the discharge of their duties, it follows that where the information sought has been obtained aliunde, the accused could not be convicted, merely because he had omitted to give the information.<sup>9</sup> It is not the intention of law that if a hundred persons possess an information, they are all to report, though they may be aware that the information had already reached the proper quarter. But where two persons are equally liable to furnish information, one cannot excuse his omission by pleading that he believed that the other must have done his duty.<sup>1</sup>

1754. Lastly, the omission must have been intentional, otherwise there can be no offence.<sup>2</sup> The word "intention" as used in this connection implies the wilful withholding of information, from a motive not quite unconnected with the desire to suppress it. But this is not necessary. If there is an omission, and the omission cannot be accounted for, it is intentional, and as such punishable.

1755. Not Legally Bound.—A servant or other dependent is not legally bound to report a death occurring in the house of his employer.<sup>3</sup> The section, of course, only applies to persons under a legal duty to report.

177. Whoever, being legally bound to furnish information on any subject to any public servant, as such, furnishes, as true, information on the subject which he knows or has reason to believe to be false, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both ;

or, if the information which he is legally bound to give respects the commission of an offence, or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Here A is guilty of the offence defined in the latter part of this section.

Explanation.—In section 176 and in this section the word "offence" includes any act committed at any place out of British India, which, if committed in British India would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459, and 460 ; and the word "offended" includes any person who is alleged to have been guilty of any such act.

1756. Analogous Law.—Reference to the Bengal Regulation III of 1821 has become unnecessary by reason of the repeal of the Regulation by Act XVII of 1862. Similar liability has, however, been now cast by s. 45 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

1757. The explanation is new, and was added by the Indian Criminal Laws Amendment Act, 1894.<sup>4</sup> This section deals with the giving of false information as the last section deals with the omission to give information. Under both the sections criminal liability depends upon legal obligation. If there is no legal obligation, there is no criminal liability, whatever may have been the information supplied or withheld and however false the information may have been.<sup>5</sup>

1758. Procedure and Practice.—Sanction is required to initiate a prosecution for an offence under this section.<sup>6</sup> It is non-cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Magistrate, first or second class. The offence falling under the first clause may be tried summarily.

1759. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused was legally bound to furnish the information.
- (2) That it was to be furnished to a public servant.
- (3) That in pursuance of such obligation he did furnish certain information.
- (4) That it was false.
- (5) That he furnished it as true, although he knew or had reason to believe that it was false.

To which may be proved the following facts in aggravation :—

- (6) That such information was with respect to the commission of an offence.

1760. Charge.—The first paragraph deals with a summons case. A charge must be framed in the case of an offence described in the second paragraph and it should distinctly set forth the particular offence in respect of which the accused gave the information which he knew to be false ; and it should appear precisely what his duty was in the matter.<sup>1</sup> It should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—, being legally bound to furnish information on any subject to wit to—a public servant as such, furnished as true the information to wit—on the subject which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be false (add if necessary) and the information which you were legally bound to give respects commission of an offence, or was required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, (or in order to the apprehension of an offender) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 177 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

1761. Principle.—Neither this section nor the last creates any obligation on the part of the public to supply any information to public servants. The latter have, in certain cases, the right to summon and examine persons likely to be cognizant with the subject-matter of their inquiry, but, in such case, the persons examined are not necessarily bound to speak the truth. That depends upon the legal obligation, otherwise created, and persons so bound to furnish information are, by the force of this section, bound to furnish true information, or at least, such information as they know or have reason to believe to be true. Otherwise, they incur the penalty provided by this section, the gravity of which depends upon whether it has, or has not to do with the commission or prevention of an offence, or the apprehension of an offender.

1762. Meaning of Words.—“Legally bound to furnish information,” e.g., under ss. 44 and 45 of the Procedure Code. “Furnishes as true—which he knows or has reason to believe to be false,” that is, gives false information not necessarily with a view to defraud. It is enough that the information furnished as true was either known to be false, or not believed to be true, e.g., an income-tax assessee, making a false return of his income.<sup>2</sup> “Or is required for the purpose of preventing,” not necessarily from the informant. In each case, “an offence” refers to some particular offence committed, and not to the commission of offences generally.

1763. Furnishing False Information.—Persons affected by this section are those who are under a legal obligation to assist public servants by furnishing them with information on stated subjects. Such obligation is cast on the public by section 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and certain persons are under the additional duty imposed on them by section 45 of the same Code. In both cases, the persons there mentioned are legally bound to furnish information on the subject therein specified to the police. They are then bound to furnish that information to them. But the obligation is not universal, for the public at large are under no obligation to keep the police informed of facts, the knowledge of which may be to their advantage. The public were, at one time, under an obligation to answer truly all questions relating to a case under investigation by the police,<sup>3</sup> but the only obligation the public are under now, since the passing of the present Procedure Code<sup>1</sup> is to answer questions relating to a case under investigation other than questions the answers to which would have a tendency to expose them to a criminal charge or to a penalty of forfeiture<sup>2</sup>. This obligation of answering questions then does not imply the duty of furnishing information and it does not, therefore, expose one to the penalty of this section.<sup>3</sup>

1764. This section is not confined to village watchmen, landholders and others, but it extends to all persons legally bound to furnish information to public servants, though they may be themselves public servants. It is thus, the duty of every police-officer to "collect and communicate intelligence affecting the public peace."<sup>4</sup> It, then, follows by force of this section, that such intelligence must be true or believed to be true.<sup>5</sup> So where a police constable was employed on round duties, it being his duty to make his rounds by night, and to call at the houses of the notorious bad characters on his beat, who were under police surveillance, and to ascertain whether they were indoors or not, the accused falsely reported to his superior officers that some of these men had been inside their houses, when, as a matter of fact, they had not, he was held to have brought himself within the penalty of the first part of this section.<sup>6</sup> So police-officers are enjoined the duty of making a record of all informations relating to cognizable or non-cognizable cases given to them.<sup>7</sup> Such record must necessarily be correct, and its one object is to inform the Superintendents of Police and District Magistrates of the offences reported to the police. This is furnishing information to public servants within the meaning of this section.

1765. If, therefore, the police-officer suppressed the real report and entered a report of a cognizable offence as one of a non-cognizable offence so as to save himself the trouble of investigation, he was held to have committed an offence under this section.<sup>8</sup> In this case, one Banwari Lall had reported that he and his companion Balla had been set upon by robbers who had robbed him of Rs. 454 and made good their escape. The report entered by the accused was that a milkman had beaten Balla, which was not the report of Banwari Lall. The same view was taken by the Calcutta High Court in a case in which the Police Sub-Inspector had minimized a serious riot into a petty assault with the same motive.<sup>9</sup> These two cases show that false information may be as much conveyed by suggestio falsi as by suppresio veri. If a robbery or a riot is described as an assault, there is the suppression of truth as much as the suggestion of a falsehood, and it is furnishing, as true, information which is known or believed to be false. A mere omission to furnish true information may, then, amount to furnishing a false return for which the offender may be dealt with under this section. It is not necessary to constitute an offence under this section that the person furnishing the false information should intend to deceive any one. All that is necessary is that the information furnished should be either known to be false, or not believed to be true.<sup>10</sup>

1766. Not Legally Bound.—Of course, persons under no legal obligation to furnish information, cannot be dealt with under this section.<sup>11</sup> For instance, if a person who is not legally bound to furnish information of an offence falsely reports to the police that he had been robbed, he could not be punished under this section, or for that matter under section 182, if there is nothing in this report to shew that he intended to cause injury or annoyance to any person.<sup>12</sup> So the purchaser of a stamp paper giving a false name to the stamp-vendor could not be proceeded against under this section, as he is not bound to disclose his true name, though the stamp-vendors are compelled to make a true indorsement on the stamp.<sup>1</sup> The vendors are by this rule only required to ascertain the real name of the purchaser who requires the stamp for use, whoever may come to purchase the stamp.<sup>2</sup> Where a person falsely stated to the Revenue Inspector that his father had died, and so got his own name entered on the land, held by his father, it was held that he could not be convicted of this offence as he was under no legal duty to speak the truth. So where under the rules of his department, the accused a deputy tahsildar, was bound to furnish a periodical return of land in his possession, and he submitted a false "nil" return; it was held that the information furnished was false, but that inasmuch as he was not legally bound to furnish a true return he could not be punished under this section, though he might be punished departmentally.<sup>3</sup> Of course, the term "legally bound" has, here, the same meaning as is defined in section 43 and the test of illegality is, as there stated, the same, namely, was the act of the accused an offence,<sup>4</sup> or was it prohibited by law; or does it furnish a ground for civil action.

1767. Now, as the furnishing of a false return was neither an offence, nor prohibited by law, nor furnished a ground for civil action, it follows that whatever else it might have been, it was not "illegal" within the meaning of that term, as given in the Code. So since the memorandums of appeals are not required to be verified, a false representation therein made, cannot be punished under this section,<sup>5</sup> or under section 182, even though the false statement was made with the object of inducing, and it did induce the appellate Court to send for the record of the case, as it cannot be said that the Court was thereby induced to do what it ought not to have done.<sup>6</sup> Of course, the liability of plaintiff and the defendant in a civil suit is in this respect different. For they are bound to verify the plaint and the written statement and if they verify statements which are false, they would be furnishing false information within the meaning of this section. The question whether a candidate for enlistment in the police-force making a false statement as to his place of residence, in order to facilitate his recruitment, is guilty of an offence under this section was answered in the negative by Tyrrell, J., in an Allahabad case.<sup>7</sup> But it does not hence follow as the learned Judge went on to hold that the accused in that case could not be convicted under section 182.<sup>8</sup> This case will again have to be adverted to under section 182.

178. Whoever refuses to bind himself by an oath [or affirmation]<sup>9</sup> to state the truth, when required so to bind himself by a public servant legally competent to require that he shall so bind himself, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

1768. Analogous Law.—This section has been amended by the addition of the word "or affirmation."<sup>10</sup> The refusal to take an oath is regarded in law as contempt of Court for which the Code of Criminal Procedure, provides with the summary remedy of punishing the recusant witness on the spot.<sup>11</sup> But the sentence that can be thus passed is limited, and if the Court considers the passing of a condign sentence essential, all it has to do is to either complain to a Magistrate, or sanction the offender's prosecution as required by section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

1769. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without the previous sanction of the public servant concerned.<sup>1</sup> The offence is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court in which the offence is committed subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Procedure Code, and in any other case by a Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

- (1) That the public servant was legally competent to require that the accused shall swear or affirm to state the truth.
- (2) That he did so require.
- (3) That the accused refused to bind himself as required.

1771. Refusing to Swear.—The liability of a person to take an oath depends upon the competency of the public servant to administer it. For it is not as a matter of course that a person is liable to swear or affirm to state the truth, nor is it in every case within the competency of a public servant to so require him to do. He may have the power to summon him, and even to compel him to make a statement. But the one power does not necessarily imply the other. For instance, in a civil suit, the Civil Courts unquestionably possess the power of summoning witnesses. But a witness so summoned is entitled to payment of his expenses before he gives evidence. If he is not prepaid, he is not bound to appear at all in answer to the summons, and it is no offence to refuse to give evidence on the ground of insufficient payment of expenses, before the Judge has decided that the payment made was sufficient.<sup>2</sup> But a witness appearing in a Criminal Court has not the same privilege. His first duty is to give evidence, which he cannot refuse on the ground of non-payment or insufficient payment of his expenses. Indeed, the payment of his expenses to him is entirely within the discretion of the Court summoning him.<sup>3</sup> This difference proceeds from the different standpoints from which witnesses in the two Courts are regarded. The one regards them as assisting in the determination of private rights, and they are therefore to be paid by the party citing them. The other, though they may be arrayed as witnesses for the prosecution or the defence, are really witnesses called to assist in the furtherance of public justice, in which case, as citizens of the State, it is their duty to assist. They are therefore bound to give evidence, and the payment of their expense is made to them out of the public chest, really on the ground of necessity. Executive officers are also empowered to summon persons to make statements in matters relating to the performance of their duties. But the question, whether they are legally competent to require the persons whom they have summoned to bind themselves by an oath or affirmation, depends upon the nature of their duties and the powers possessed by them in this respect.

1772. The Indian Oaths Act<sup>4</sup> empowers a non-Christian witness to affirm instead of taking an oath. The Court could not then compel such a witness to bind himself by an oath, much less dictate to him the form of the oath which he is to take.

1773. What constitutes a sufficient oath or affirmation has been already discussed under section 51 (§§ 352-353).

179. Whoever, being legally bound to state the truth on any subject to any public servant, refuses to answer any question demanded of him touching that subject by such public servant in the exercise of the legal powers of such public servant, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

(4) Act X of 1873.

1774. Analogous Law.—This section is merely a continuation of the last section, and refers to what is a refusal to give evidence. A person may bind himself by an oath to state the truth, and he may thus escape the toils of the last section. But he may still refuse to state the truth or speak at all in which case he could only be punished under this section.

1775. His liability to state the truth has been, however, somewhat qualified by the Indian Evidence Act which lays down certain exemptions applicable to witnesses.<sup>1</sup> Within the limits so prescribed, witnesses are not bound to answer questions and their refusal to answer them is privileged and cannot be made punishable under this section. So, again, witnesses examined by the police are privileged against having to answer questions which have a tendency to expose them to a criminal charge or to a penalty or forfeiture.<sup>2</sup> In such case, their refusal could not constitute an offence under this section. Indeed, this section has only reference to persons who are legally bound to state the truth, and not those who are privileged.

1776. Procedure and Practice.—The sanction of the Court or public servant concerned is necessary to initiate a prosecution under this section. The offence is non-cognizable and summons must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in any other case, by a Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class, and it may be tried summarily.

- (1) That the accused was legally bound to state the truth on the subject in question.<sup>3</sup>
- (2) That he was so bound to the public servant questioning him.
- (3) That he refused to answer such question.
- (4) That the question was put in the exercise of the legal powers of such public servant.

1778. When is a Refusal to Answer an Offence.—As has been before observed (§ 1774), this section does not make it penal to refuse to answer any question put by a public servant. The obligation depends upon (i) the legal obligation, (ii) to state the truth, (iii) on any subject, (iv) to a public servant whose power is again confined to demand an answer only, (v) to such questions, and (vi) in the exercise of the legal powers of such public servant. It is not for the section to state what creates such a legal obligation for it has been created by a number of enactments concerned with the trial of questions in which the examination of parties and witnesses becomes necessary. The two Codes of Civil<sup>4</sup> and Criminal<sup>5</sup> Procedure confer such an obligation on all persons summoned to appear before, or called upon to make a statement to the Courts. Revenue Courts may be similarly empowered<sup>6</sup> and there are other public servants who possess the power to summon persons to make statements, but the liability to make a statement does not necessarily imply the liability to state the truth. Thus, for instance, a police-officer making an investigation under Chapter XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure is entitled to examine orally any person supposed to be acquainted with the facts and circumstances of the case, and such person is bound to answer all questions relating to such case put to him by such officer other than the question the answer to which would have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge or to a penalty or forfeiture.<sup>7</sup> Here then the only liability of the person questioned is merely to answer all questions, and it does not extend to answer those questions truly. In short, such a person is not “legally bound to state the truth,” and he cannot, therefore, be prosecuted under this section if he refuses to make any statement to the police, for a mere refusal to answer a question is not punishable under this section.<sup>1</sup> This was the view taken under the similar language of the Procedure Code of 1872,<sup>2</sup> but under the Procedure Code of 1882 such persons were bound to answer "truly" all such questions put to them which then created the legal obligation to state the truth.<sup>3</sup> In any case, the police officer investigating a case cannot order a person to look at the hands of a complainant and to answer whether there were any marks of tying with a rope on his hands. An answer to such a question would at least be an opinion which under no provision of law is a police-officer entitled to compel a man to give, except in the case of sudden and unnatural death, when a police-officer is allowed to summon persons to act as jurymen.<sup>4</sup> So a person in the position of a complainant cannot be compelled to answer all questions put to him by the Court—a question, for example, as to his motive in instituting the complaint.<sup>5</sup>

1779. Even as regards a witness, while the Court possesses plenty of power to ask questions to a witness, whether relevant or irrelevant, still that power does not empower the Court to ask any irrelevant question, whether it is or is not subservient to proof of relevant facts. Where, therefore, the Judge asked a witness questions not with the object of discovering proof of relevant facts, but with a view to criminal proceedings being taken against him, he was held not bound to answer them, and his refusal to answer them did not expose him to the penalty of this section.<sup>6</sup> In this case, the accused was the decree-holder in a civil suit, and had, as such, sued out an execution for recovery of money against the judgment-debtor who thereupon filed a receipt purporting to have been executed by the accused. The Subordinate Judge asked him whether he had executed it, but the accused persisted in refusing to answer the question, whereupon the Subordinate Judge convicted him under s. 480 of the Procedure Code. But it was held that the accused was not bound to incriminate himself by answering the question put to him.

1780. It will thus be seen that the Court has not the unlimited jurisdiction of putting any question to any witness on the pain of punishing him under this section, in case of his refusal to answer it. His power to question witnesses is limited by the subject of his inquiry, but this must not be scanned too narrowly, for it is not for the witness to say whether a question is or is not relevant to the inquiry on foot. But if he refuses to answer a question, it will be then for the prosecution to shew that the question put was such as was within the legal powers of the public servant, and that the accused was legally bound to answer it.

1781. This section only deals with the refusal to answer questions. If he does not refuse, but answers falsely, he does not commit an offence under this section, though he may then be guilty of giving false evidence under s. 191 of the Code. So where the accused was asked the name of his grandfather, and he replied that he did not remember it, he had not refused to answer the question and he could not, therefore, be convicted of this offence.<sup>7</sup> But in one case where the Court, wishing to know whether one Badri had given out the details of a story, questioned the witness what Badri said, to which he replied, "He named no one," he was convicted under s. 228, but the High Court on appeal altered the conviction to one under this section, holding that, in giving the reply he did, he refused to answer the question put to him.<sup>8</sup>

1782. Analogous Law.—This provision of the law was enacted at a time when under the Regulations then in force, all witnesses were required to subscribe to their depositions.<sup>1</sup> This is now no longer required as a matter of legal necessity. There are, however, some statements which persons are still required to sign. For instance, an information relating to the commission of a cognizable offence given orally to an officer in charge of a police-station "shall be signed by the person giving it."<sup>2</sup> So statements made and confessions recorded under s. 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code are required to be signed by the person making them. The complainant making an oral complaint to a Magistrate is bound to sign the substance of his examination reduced to writing by a Magistrate.<sup>3</sup> The accused in a criminal case is similarly bound to sign his examination if it is made conformable to what he declares is the truth,<sup>4</sup> and his refusal would be punishable under this section.<sup>5</sup>

1783. The only provision of law under which witnesses are now legally bound to sign their statements is s. 20 of the Coroners Act<sup>6</sup> under which witnesses refusing to sign their statements are deemed to have committed an offence under this section.

1784. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without the previous sanction of the Court or public servant concerned. The offence is non-cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Code of Criminal Procedure, or, if not committed in a Court, then by a Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

- (1) That the accused made the statement.
- (2) That he was required to sign such statement by a public servant.
- (3) That such public servant was legally competent to require the accused to sign his statement.
- (4) That the accused refused to sign that statement.

1786. Refusal to Sign Statement.—A person under the legal obligation to sign any statement made by him, commits an offence if he refuses to sign it.<sup>7</sup> The obligation to sign a statement depends upon his liability to sign it, and upon the legal competency of the public servant to require him to sign it. The question whether the accused in a case making a statement or a confession to a Magistrate can be compelled to sign his statement or confession, and whether his refusal to sign it amounts to an offence under this section has been decided in the negative by Westropp, C. J., who held that, since such confession must be voluntary, he must have a locus pœnitentiæ by refusing to sign, signifying his unwillingness to furnish evidence against himself.<sup>8</sup> him. In other words the subject-matter of the inquiry was wholly beyond his jurisdiction. So where the Court (a District Munsiff) held an inquiry into the conduct of a pleader under the Legal Practitioners' Act, and examined him on affirmation, it was held that the Munsiff had no jurisdiction to administer him an oath in an inquiry under that Act, and that any false statement made by the pleader could not be punished under this section.<sup>1</sup>

1787. So again, there is no law which obliges a witness in a civil<sup>9</sup> or a revenue case to subscribe to his statement.<sup>10</sup> And even in a civil or criminal case whenever a statement is required to be signed all the preliminaries such as the reading over of the deposition and the like must be strictly complied with.<sup>11</sup> So though section

1797. In another case the accused had in his petition of appeal from a conviction, falsely stated that the convicting Magistrate had refused to summon his witnesses. The appellate Court thereupon examined him on affirmation, and he reiterated his statement, whereupon he was convicted under this and the next section, but his conviction was set aside by the High Court who held that the accused could not have been legally examined by the Court, and that the Court examining him was not authorised by law to administer oath. "It was not the intention of the Legislature," observed Collins, C. J., and Parker, J., "that the accused should be called upon during the trial of a criminal case to make a statement on oath, or that he should be liable to punishment for giving false answers to questions put to him."<sup>2</sup> The Code does not require that the appeal petition should be verified; sections 428 and 540 do not seem to us to authorize the examination of the accused as a witness.<sup>3</sup> A criminal appeal is a continuation of the criminal case, and, except so far as there is provision to the contrary, the appellant has the privilege of the accused, and cannot be punished for making false statements."<sup>4</sup>

182. Whoever gives to any public servant any information which he knows or believes to be false, intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, such public servant—
 (a) to do or omit anything which such public servant ought not to do or omit if the true state of facts respecting which such information is given were known by him, or
 (b) to use the lawful power of such public servant to the injury or annoyance of any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

(a) A informs a Magistrate that Z, a police-officer, subordinate to such Magistrate, has been guilty of neglect of duty or misconduct, knowing such information to be false, and knowing it to be likely that the information will cause the Magistrate to dismiss Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A falsely informs a public servant that Z has contraband salt in a secret place, knowing such information to be false, and knowing that it is likely that the consequence of the information will be a search of Z's premises, attended with annoyance to Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(c) A falsely informs a policeman that he has been assaulted and robbed in the neighbourhood of a particular village. He does not mention the name of any person as one of his assailants, but knows it to be likely that in consequence of this information the police will make enquiries and institute searches in the village to the annoyance of the villagers or some of them. A has committed an offence under this section.

1798. Analogous Law.—This section was substituted for the original s. 182 by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act.<sup>5</sup> This section, as originally stood, had led to a decision of the Calcutta High Court acquitting the accused who had made a false report of theft without implicating any one, which was held to be of the essence of the offence.<sup>1</sup> As this was not the intention of the Legislature, the section was amended and illustration (c) added,<sup>2</sup> making it clear that the mere giving of false information was an offence, if the informant knew that on his information the public servant was likely to act, which he would not otherwise have done, or that he was then likely to cause injury or annoyance to any person.

1799. Section 211 is analogous to this section, the distinction between the two will be found set out under that section. (§§ 2257-2261 post).

1800. Procedure and Practice.—Where the false information amounts to an offence under this section, no prosecution can be instituted against the false informant without the previous complaint of the public servant concerned, or of some public servant to whom he is subordinate.<sup>3</sup> Such complaint once made, must be accepted as good by the trying Court till it is set aside by a Court of competent jurisdiction,<sup>4</sup> where a report is made against two persons A and B, and the police prosecute A but take no action against B, the fact that a previous complaint of the Court is required to try A does not imply that its complaint is equally required to try B.<sup>5</sup>

1801. An offence under this section is complete as soon as the information is given and not when upon enquiry it is found to be false, since its falsehood relates back to the information given.<sup>6</sup> Though the person injured on account of the false information given under this section may be a private person, the latter cannot prosecute under this section without the complaint of the public servant to whom the information was given or of some public servant to whom he is subordinate.<sup>7</sup> This is in consequence of a legal impediment placed in his way by section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but for which there would have been no objection to his prosecuting him without the privity of the public servant. As, however, there is no legal bar to his instituting a civil suit for damages, he may do so without the sanction of the public servant.<sup>8</sup> But criminal law regards this as primarily an offence against the public servant, and he has, therefore, the right of complaining without the sanction of his superior officer.<sup>9</sup> But before doing so he is bound to make some inquiry which satisfies him of the falsity of information given to him which he is moreover bound to place before the Court.<sup>10</sup> But if he complains without having made such inquiry the accused cannot, it is said, object to his prosecution on the ground that the prosecutor had not sufficiently inquired into the truth of his information or that he had not been given an opportunity of substantiating it. Nor can he claim an opportunity to substantiate his information in Court before he is prosecuted.<sup>11</sup> But such an opportunity is afforded to the accused if the charge is one under section 211,<sup>12</sup> and there are cases in which the same rule is held equally applicable to this section,<sup>13</sup> since no complainant can swear to the falsity of an information into the truth of which he has not even inquired.<sup>14</sup> The question is really one of judicial propriety, and if the accused complains betimes

the Court is bound to inquire into his complaint before turning the tables upon him. A person might be convicted under s. 211 though the complaint was made only under s. 182,<sup>1</sup> and, it appears, vice versa.<sup>2</sup>

1802. Where the Court refuses to complain under s. 211 or this section, it would not take up the same matter at the instance of the same party under some other section which does not call for a similar pre-requisite.<sup>3</sup> If a false information has gone to the Court, and the Court does not complain, it does not prevent the police officer from complaining. Where a person gave false information to the police, the fact that his complaint had been the subject of judicial inquiry resulting in the discharge of the accused, was held to be no bar to a complaint by the police under s. 195 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code.<sup>4</sup>

1803. Since s. 211 is a more serious offence than the one under this section, it is improper to prosecute under this section in preference to s. 211.<sup>5</sup> But the fact whether a discharge under s. 211, would prevent a fresh inquiry upon the initiation of proper proceedings depends upon the facts of each case and the language of s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. For example, if a case under s. 211 is started by the police and withdrawn by a competent authority, the case cannot be revived by another complaint lodged under this section.<sup>6</sup>

1804. The offence is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

1805. Proof.—It is on the prosecution to prove that the information given was false and that the informer knew or believed it to be so.<sup>7</sup> The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused gave some information;<sup>8</sup>
- (2) That the person to whom it was given was a public servant;<sup>9</sup>
- (3) That the information given was false,
- (4) And that the accused when giving it knew or believed it to be false;<sup>10</sup>
- (5) That the accused intended or knew that his information will probably cause the public servant to act as in clauses (a) and (b).<sup>11</sup>

1806. Charge.—The charges, if necessary, should run thus:—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“ That you——on or about the——day——at——gave to (name of the public servant), a public servant, the following information namely,——intending thereby to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby cause) such public servant (to do or omit) something to wit——which such public servant ought not to do (or omit) if the true state of facts were known by him (or to use the lawful power of such public servant, to the injury (or annoyance of——)) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

1807. Principle.—As stated before, this section belongs to the class of offences which relate to the swerving of public servants from the path of their legitimate duties. As such, law punishes both those who abuse their powers as well as those who mislead them to its exercise by false reports or evidence.

1808. And the gravity of the offence varies with the degree of the threatened mischief. A false information given to a police-officer may result in inconvenience. But one given to a Court of Justice may lead to the forfeiture of one's life and liberty. Law, therefore, visits such informants with condign punishment, the gravity of which varies with the issues which the false information may have given rise. In all such cases, the offence is one, though its names are many.

1809. Meaning of Words.—“Gives any information”: This does not include the statement made by the accused for the purposes of his defence,<sup>1</sup> nor answers to questions put by a police-officer under section 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.<sup>2</sup> But otherwise, it includes any information whether given on request or otherwise.<sup>3</sup> “Which he knows or believes to be false”: This means that the information was not only in fact false, but the accused also knew it or believed it to be false. “To do or omit anything.....or to use the lawful power, etc.”: This must be only known to be likely. It is not required that the public servant should in fact do or omit anything, or in fact use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person. As to the meaning of “injury,” see section 44.

1810. Giving of False Information When an Offence.—The narrow meaning ascribed to this section, prior to its amendment in 1895 has been elsewhere discussed (§ 1789). Its present phraseology is much wider, and the only ingredients now required to constitute the offence are (i) the giving of false information (§ 1811), (ii) to a public servant (s. 21 comm.), (iii) which the informant knew or believed to be false (§ 1812), and (iv) which he had given to influence a public servant to act otherwise than he would have acted without it. (§ 1819).

1811. False Information.—In the first place, then there must have been the giving of false information. The term “information” is here used in its widest sense as denoting the communication of any intelligence or knowledge of facts whether it is or is not in the nature of an accusation. It, however, does not mean the mere filing of a paper by one on behalf of another, e.g., a pleader filing his client’s affidavit;<sup>4</sup> or the reporting by one of a rumour as a rumour, or the suggestion of a possible clue to the discovery of a fact unknown, as by declaring one’s belief that one suspects a particular person of having committed the offence.<sup>5</sup> At the same time the form in which the information is conveyed is immaterial, if it was in substance a statement of facts so intended and understood. But an expression of opinion may be stated as a fact, as where a person petitioned the Collector that certain zemindars had usurped possession of a market-place which belonged to Government. Here the question of ownership was stated as a fact, though it was nothing more than an expression of the writer’s belief for which he could not be visited with the penalties of this section.<sup>6</sup>

1812. The information given need not have been volunteered, for it may have been given in answer to questions put in the course of an inquiry made by a public servant<sup>7</sup> or in answer to questions put by a superior officer about his subordinate, e.g., an information given to the Deputy Superintendent of Police that his subordinate a Sub-Inspector had taken a bribe,<sup>8</sup> but all such statements cannot, if false, be made punishable under this section. For instance, the statement made by an accused for the purpose of his defence may be a false statement, and may, moreover, satisfy all the other requirements of the section, but it cannot be made the basis of a charge under this section<sup>9</sup> since statements are privileged and are, indeed, in the nature of an explanation, rather than of information supplied to a Magistrate.<sup>10</sup>

(1) A false information implicating two persons only constitutes one offence and not two offences, though it may have been directed to the injury of them; Poonit Singh v. Madho Bhat, 13 C. 270.

(7) Ramji Sajabarao, 10 B. 124; Bhikaiji, (1877) B. U. C. 124 (126). The contrary was laid down by Irwin, J. C., Upper Burmah, in Nga Aung Po, (1905) U. B. R. 13, 2 Cr. L. J. 474, in which he said: “The plain ordinary meaning of the expression ‘give information’ is to volunteer information, and not to make statements in answer to questions put by the public servant.”

(10) S. 342, Cr. P. C.

But answers given to questions put by a police-officer in the course of investigation in a cognizable case are not comprised in the term "information" nor can the answering of such questions be correctly described as the "giving" of information. Under the Procedure Code of 1882 the public were no doubt bound to answer "truly" all questions put to them by the police while investigating a cognizable case. If, therefore, they answered falsely they could have been then prosecuted under s. 193 of the Code. But this obligation of answering "truly" no longer exists, and if this section had applied, it would have rendered nugatory the policy which dictated the amendment of the Procedure Code by removal of the word "truly" from section 162 of the Procedure Code. So Irwin, C. J., observed that as persons examined by the police can no longer be punished for giving false evidence, it would be a mere evasion of Law to hold them liable under this section.<sup>1</sup>

1813. So again, a false statement made in the plaint<sup>2</sup> or pleadings, or in the petition of appeal<sup>3</sup> cannot be held to be false information within the meaning of this section<sup>4</sup> as even though the information so conveyed be false, it cannot be said to have been given with the intention to cause the Court concerned to do or omit anything which he ought not otherwise to have done, or to use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person. So although a person falsely verifying a petition may be punishable under section 177 of the Code<sup>5</sup> neither that section nor this applies to the verification of a document, for example, a memorandum of appeal not required by law to be verified.<sup>6</sup>

1814. The false information given to one person A, to be passed on to another B, which it was his duty to do, must be considered as false information given to B for the purpose of this section.<sup>7</sup>

1815. "Knows or believes to be false."—Secondly, the information given must be not only false, but it must be false to the knowledge or belief of the informant. Of course, the latter may believe that his information is false and as such he may convey it to a public servant, but if it turns out to be true, he could not be punished for giving out what he believed to be false information, but which, in fact, was true. To punish him in such a case would be to punish him for his bad intentions. If, however, the information given was false, that fact alone is not sufficient to condemn the informant, for, besides being false, he must have, at the time he gave it, known or believed it to be false. It is not sufficient that the accused has reason to believe it to be false, or that he does not believe it to be true; there must be positive knowledge or belief that it is false.<sup>8</sup> But how is this to be proved, except by showing that the circumstances were such that the accused could not have in all probability knowledge or belief in the truth of his information. The question is then one in which a greater degree of probability may be required, but the means of knowledge are still the same. The prosecution proves facts from which the Court draws an inference that the accused must have possessed the knowledge or belief that his information was false. The accused may rebut this inference by showing, that he had reasonable grounds for believing the information given to be true. He is not bound to show that it was in fact true.<sup>9</sup> The question in either case depends upon his own bona fides. If he was reckless but honest the section saves him, for it does not punish those who merely blunder into giving false information, but those who do it with an ulterior object in view, that object being to make a public servant to do or omit anything which such public servant ought not to do, or to use his lawful power to the injury of any person.

1816. Ulterior Intention.—This leads to the next question as to the informant's intention or knowledge. 'Given false information' and belief in its falsehood, the offence is not complete unless it is accompanied by the particular intention or knowledge here described. As Straight, J., remarked in a case: "The criminality contemplated by section 182 does not depend upon what is done or omitted to be done by the public servant on such false information, but what was, from the facts, the reasonable intention to be inferred on the part of the person who gave the false information."<sup>1</sup> The section contemplates two intentions on the part of the person giving the false information which are described in the two clauses (a) and (b). The first intention may be accomplished as soon as the informant does an act with the intention or knowledge that the public servant will, acting on his information, do or omit anything which he "ought not to do or omit if the true state of facts respecting which such information is given were known by him."

1817. Under this clause then it is unnecessary that the act or omission should affect or cause injury to some third person. As Sir John Edge remarked: "Suppose a man knowing the statement to be untrue, but intending the Magistrate to act upon it, informed the Magistrate of the district that a violent fire was raging in a city in the district of which he had charge. Now, if the Magistrate believed that statement, he would naturally send as many police as he could spare to assist in quelling the fire and keeping order. He might possibly also ask for the assistance of the military if there were any in the neighbourhood. That would be a perfect example of a hoax, and, I have not a doubt that it would come within section 182, whether the Magistrate acted upon the information or not. To take another example of a case which, in my opinion, would come within the section, although the public servant was not induced to take action, or omit to take action upon the information given to him. Let us say that a man had absconded for an offence from Allahabad, and that it was surmised that he would seek to escape at one of the shipping ports. Information of his having absconded would be communicated to those ports, Calcutta being amongst the number. A person who, knowing that the man had not been arrested, and intending that the authorities at Calcutta should cease to watch the outward-bound shipping, telegraphed to the authorities at Calcutta, informing them that the absconder had been arrested elsewhere, would, in my opinion, have committed an offence under section 182 although the public servant at Calcutta had not acted on the telegram, but had persisted in his surveillance of the outward-bound shipping."<sup>2</sup> Compared to it the false report made by the accused that his horse had been stolen, which as a matter of fact he had sold it to his cousin is clearly within the rule, when the object of the accused was shown to be to implicate the person who had purchased the horse from his cousin.<sup>3</sup> But the case would have been different if the accused had rested content by alleging that his horse had disappeared, in which case there being no report of a cognizable offence and not in itself calling for any action by the police the accused could not have been convicted under this section.<sup>4</sup>

1818. The intention of the Legislature in drawing this section was that a public servant should not be falsely given information with the intent that he should be misled by a person who believed that information to be false, and was intending to mislead him.<sup>5</sup> It is not necessary that the public servant misinformed should have taken or omitted to take any action on the information given. The offence is complete, as soon as the false information is given with the knowledge that it will probably influence the public servant in the direction desired. The latter may be more circumspect and disbelieve the information without taking any action, or the only action he may take may be to inquire into the truth of the information, but in either case the offence is complete, and the criminality of the accused is just the same.<sup>1</sup> In short, the offence consists in the mischief threatened, and not necessarily in the mischief done. A personated B at an examination called the vernacular sixth standard examination. He passed it and obtained a certificate from the educational authorities in B's name, who thereupon applied to the Assistant Collector to have his name registered in the list of candidates for service in the Revenue Department, and attached to his application the certificate issued in his name, as it was a rule of Government that only those who had passed the sixth standard examination were eligible for employment in the Revenue Department. On receipt of this application B's name was registered as a candidate. It was held that B was guilty of an offence under this section,<sup>2</sup> and he would have been guilty of an offence under section 471 if he had made the certificate which he had filed with his petition.<sup>3</sup> As the section is newly worded, there can be no question as to the correctness of this view; for the false information was supplied by B in the false certificate he had filed. He knew that it was false, and he equally knew that its production was necessary to secure his enlistment as a candidate for employment in the Revenue Department of Government; that is, he knew that by producing the certificate he was likely to induce the Assistant Collector to enlist him, which otherwise he "ought not" to have done.

1819. The words "ought not to do" are important for they imply duty, "Ought not to Do," and exclude personal choice<sup>4</sup> that is to say, they exclude consideration of what the public servant would actually have done or omitted in consequence of the information. They only direct attention to what he should not have done or omitted if he had not been misinformed. In other words, the test is that of a normal public servant doing his duty and not of one who was actually misinformed. Thus, suppose, in the case last cited the rule of the Revenue Department were that the Assistant Collector could exercise his discretion in enlisting candidates in exceptional cases. The fact that B's case was exceptional would not exonerate him from liability under this section, for it is not open to him to plead that he might have been enlisted without the certificate. So where the accused sent a telegram to the District Magistrate in camp that the town had been attacked by 200 robbers and that though dispelled there was danger, and the Magistrate put no faith in the telegram and took no action thereupon, it was held that the offence had been committed because the sender believed that the Magistrate was likely to take action upon his telegram,—the fact whether in fact he did or not being immaterial.<sup>5</sup> A person who procured his enlistment in the police-force by misstating his caste as Jat, though he was in fact an Ahir, a caste whose enlistment was prohibited, was held to be guilty of an offence under this section.<sup>6</sup> The contrary was laid down by Tyrrell, J., in an Allahabad case,<sup>7</sup> but he gives no reason for holding this section inapplicable, and his view has no reason to commend it. So where the accused appeared before a village Registrar and falsely personated W and in such assumed character, expressed a desire to execute a lease in favour of A who was present and assented to have the lease. When the accused made some mistake in giving the area of the land, A corrected him, E identified B as W before the village Registrar, and he and D assured the attesting witnesses that B was W. It was held that B, C, D and E were all guilty of an offence under this section.<sup>8</sup>

1820. It will be observed that the section speaks of "such public servant" in connection with the likelihood of his doing or omitting to do anything, which means that the information must be given to the public servant intending that he was likely to do or omit as stated in the two clauses. This was necessary, for the giving of false information to A with the intention that B may do something thereupon, would not be an offence under this section, unless A was under a bounden duty to inform B which the informant knew. So where the accused charged one Rukminamra before the Village Magistrate of arson, the latter sent the report on to the police, as it was his duty. The police investigated the case and found that the information given was false, whereupon he was convicted under this section. He contended before the High Court that he had not given any information to the police, and that his statement recorded by them was presumably under section 162 of the Procedure Code, and that he could not, therefore, be convicted under this section. But it was held that the offence was complete as soon as the information was given to the Village Magistrate who was a public servant, but that the accused had, moreover, conveyed the information to the police through the agency of the Magistrate, since it was the bounden duty of the latter to pass the information on to the former, and that, therefore, the accused could not complain that he had made no communication to the police.<sup>1</sup>

1821. On the other hand, where in a resignation addressed to the Collector, as officer-in-charge of the Court of Wards, the accused gave a false account of an affray and defamed certain persons whereupon the Collector as District Magistrate ordered his prosecution of this offence, it was held that the accused had not invoked the authority of the District Magistrate to act upon his information and that he could not, therefore, be convicted under this section.<sup>2</sup>

1822. Abuse of Lawful Power.—The case where a person directs his information against some one in particular, presents no difficulty. It is then a clear case either under this section or section 211, and if the information be sworn testimony, it is then a case of perjury and, as such, punishable either under section 193 or section 194. A simple example of such information is a petition made by a person to the police falsely stating that the petitioner suspects another person of having committed an offence and praying for inquiry.<sup>3</sup> It is not of the essence of an offence under this section that it should be the primary aim or intention of the informant that the person informed against should be injured or annoyed. It is sufficient if he is aware of the likelihood of injury or annoyance being caused to him by the public servant in consequence of his information. This clause would then include not only malicious charges, but reckless statements made without regard to the feelings of another thereby implicated or affected. Such a case may arise where a person having suffered a loss of his property by theft names a number of persons to the police as thieves or receivers. So where A having lost some of his property by theft reported to the police that the houses of B and C might be searched as he had heard the bad characters of his village declare that they had committed the theft and screened the property with B and C, it was held that A's statement having been proved to be false, he was liable to conviction under this section, for his statement had been made to the injury of B and C. But in such a case the statement being one, the accused would be liable to conviction as for one offence, though two persons were affected by his statement.

1823. No Offence.—This section does not punish a person for asking a public servant to do an illegal act, even if true facts were stated to him.<sup>4</sup> What it does punish is the giving of false information with intent to secure the use of his legal powers by a public servant. Since the intention and knowledge of likelihood that a public servant will take action is an essential ingredient of this offence, it has been held that whatever may be the ulterior motive of the informer, his criminality depends upon the probability of action taken upon his report, which, again, depends upon the nature of information given. Where, for example, the accused who having sold his bullock to another, complained of its loss to the police, his intention being to implicate the purchaser, the Court held his report of itself insufficient to justify his conviction under this section.<sup>1</sup> In another case, where no such intention was disclosed, the same result followed, the court holding that as there was no complaint of a cognizable or non-cognizable offence it did not fall within the mischief of this section.<sup>2</sup>

183. Whoever offers any resistance to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of any public servant, knowing or having reason to believe that he is such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

[Property—s. 22.]

1824. Analogous Law.—This section was clause 164 of the Bill, but it was condemned as “too wordy—too particular.”<sup>3</sup> It was then recast and the present section is the outcome.

1825. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be initiated under this section without the previous sanction of the public servant concerned.<sup>4</sup> In other respects the procedure is the same as under the last section.

1826. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused offered resistance to the taking of any property.
- (2) That the property was being taken by the authority of a public servant.
- (3) That such authority was lawful.
- (4) That at the time of offering resistance, he knew or had reason to believe that he was a public servant who had authorized the taking of the property.

1827. Principle.—Offering resistance to the seizure of property by the lawful authority of a public servant amounts to an overt act of defiance of his authority. As such, it is punishable as a contempt under this section.

1828. Meaning of Words.—“Offers any resistance” : Resistance is obstruction, and implies something more than a mere verbal opposition to seizure. It means the use of, or at least the threat to use force if necessary. “By lawful authority of any public servant,” which means that the order must be prima facie legal, though it may not be strictly justifiable by law.<sup>5</sup> “Knowing or having reason to believe,” which fact being a necessary part of the offence must be established by the prosecution.

1829. Unlawful Resistance to Seizure of Property.—The offence here described is unlawful resistance to seizure of property. (1) There must be Resistance. The graveness of the offence lies in the fact that if the legal orders of public servants are defied with impunity, it will defeat the very purpose for which they are passed. The offence is not necessarily one of contempt, for the offence does not consist in the mere refusal to deliver up one's property on demand of a public servant. For in order to constitute an offence there must be not only a refusal but resistance. Where, therefore, a bailiff in execution of a warrant demanded money from the accused, which was alleged to be in his pocket, and which he refused to hand over, it was held that no offence under this section was committed, as the mere refusal of the accused to deliver up his property did not amount to resistance to the taking of property which was the first requirement of the section.<sup>6</sup> Of course, if in such a case the bailiff had after making the demand laid his hand on the accused to take his money, and the accused had prevented him from taking it, by, say, pushing him off or by running away from him, he would have been then guilty of an offence under this section. No offence under this section can then be committed until the public servant, who is resisted, has begun to take the property.<sup>1</sup> Even then there must be resistance, which implies some thing more than a verbal protest or objection. Where, for instance, a bailiff went to attach the property of a carpenter who was also a maker of tongas, and he proceeded to attach two of the tonga-tops lying in front of his shop, whereupon the accused said that he would not allow him to attach them as they were his property. He did no more. It was held that his verbal direction not to remove the tonga-tops did not amount to illegal resistance within the meaning of the section.<sup>2</sup> But if such a protest had been accompanied by a threat of coming violence if the bailiff persisted in removing the property, the accused would then have been guilty of resistance. It was so held in a case in which on the accused refusing to deliver up the property, the attaching officer said that he would take it by force, whereupon the accused exclaimed that if force was used he would reduce the property (a pair of gold wristlets) to pieces and it would go hard against him. The accused had two other companions with him at the time and they both said: "Don't give the property to the police. Let us see how he takes it." All the three were convicted both under this as well as section 186, and the Court upheld their conviction, though their conviction under this section was set aside as superfluous.<sup>3</sup>

1830. Taking must be by Lawful Authority.—Secondly, the resistance

must be to the taking of property by the lawful authority of a public servant. What these words mean in an ordinary case, it is not difficult to conjecture. They surely imply that the order in execution of which the property is seized must have been a legal one, and in force at the time of its execution. Where, for instance, a Deputy Collector issued a warrant under the Public Demands Recovery Act, 1880<sup>4</sup> returnable before the 3rd February, and it was sought to be put in force on the 4th February, it was held that the resistance offered was not punishable under this section, as the warrant was spent and no lawful order was in force on the day of execution.<sup>5</sup>

1831. The same view was taken in another case in which the warrant for attachment of the judgment-debtor's property was not signed by the Civil Court in whose name it had been issued. There was no inventory of the goods to be attached, but it authorized the attachment of the judgment-debtor's property, such as might be pointed out by the decree-holder, who was not present to point out the goods. The bailiff proceeded to attach the goods not in possession of the judgment-debtor but of the pawnee who refused to part with them. It was held that the bailiff had no legal authority to attach the goods.<sup>6</sup> And the same view has been reiterated in other cases.<sup>7</sup> So under the Bengal Chawkidari Act<sup>8</sup> the Chawkidar is empowered to attach the moveables of persons liable to pay the Chawkidari tax, but such attachment must be under the written authority of a collecting member of the Panchayat<sup>9</sup> which could only be given after the preparation and publication of the list of defaulters.<sup>10</sup> Where therefore without such publication or written authority, a Chawkidar proceeded to attach a drum of a tenant who resisted him, it was held that the resistance was lawful because the distraint was unlawful.<sup>11</sup>

1832. The bailiff has no right to enter into or break open the doors of the house of a third person in order to execute the process of the law upon the judgment-debtor or his property, unless he is sure that it was used to screen him or his property. The right of the sheriff to break doors was considered in a leading English case,<sup>12</sup> in which it was held that the rule that "every man's house is his castle" does not prevent his door being forced open, if he has concealed the goods of the judgment-debtor, or is himself liable to deliver them; and that if he refuses to deliver them, the Sheriff has a right to break into the house.

1833. In India, the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes the conditions, subject to which the judgment-debtor's goods and moveables must be seized and his house broken open, which must be strictly complied with.<sup>1</sup> The Code of Criminal Procedure, also, contains provisions for the arrest of persons<sup>2</sup> and the attachment of property of absconders.<sup>3</sup>

1833-A. A Village Munsiff has been held to possess jurisdiction to distrain the property of a defaulter outside his jurisdiction, for arrears of revenue in respect of land within his jurisdiction, though in the demand notice authorizing him to distrain, he be not referred to by his name but by his office. Obstruction to such distraint outside the local limits of his jurisdiction is, therefore, punishable under this section.<sup>4</sup> But if the distraint is not bona fide, a conviction under this section will not lie.<sup>5</sup> In all such cases the provisions of law regulating the seizure of property must be strictly complied with. So it has been held that if a bailiff breaks the doors of the house of a third person in order to execute a decree against a judgment-debtor, he is a trespasser if it turns out that the person or goods of the debtor are not in the house; and under such circumstances the owner of the house does not by obstructing the bailiff, render himself punishable under this section.<sup>6</sup> These cases then support not only the proposition that the section only makes it a crime to offer resistance to the exercise of lawful authority in the manner there stated, and that conversely, if the authority was not lawful then the resistance to the taking of the property could not be deemed unlawful.

1834. Resistance to Seizure Not Strictly Justifiable.—The question whether this section is subject to the provisions of section 99 admits of no doubt, that it must be read with that section seems clear, and it has been so held.<sup>7</sup> But s. 99 itself lays down a limitation upon the measure of illegality which is condoned by that section. It excepts the right of private defence, when an act is done by the direction of a public servant "acting in good faith under colour of his office, though that direction may not be strictly justifiable by law." This implies an honest error on the part of the public servant and a very slight defect in his order. It excludes a perverse conscious order on his part or a patent illegality in his order, nor does it even intend to cover an irregularity in the process, or in the mode of its execution.

1835. The order of a public servant might be illegal because of several reasons, first, because the authority of the official was uncertain; secondly, because the order passed by him was defective; or thirdly, the mode of its execution was unwarranted by law. The words "in good faith under colour of his office" and "not strictly justifiable by law" are words of limitation and extension. The first limit the extent of the illegality, the other define the limit within which it would be condoned. But apart from the compass of protection afforded to him by s. 99 there remains the prerequisite of this offence, namely, that resistance must be to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of any public servant casting the burden of proving this fact on the prosecution, without which proof there can be no conviction of this offence. In other words, the resistance offered to an act may not be justified by the provisions of s. 99, and yet it will not be punishable, unless it contravenes the provisions of this section. Take, for instance, a case like the following: The Court passes a decree against the assets of a deceased debtor A, and in execution, process is issued to seize such property. The Amin seizes the property of B, who resists, whereupon he is convicted of this offence on the mere fact of his resistance, without proof that the Amin's seizure was lawful i.e., that the goods he attempted to seize were those of A and not of B. The Madras Court held the accused in such a case guilty holding that the Amin had lawful authority to seize, though he possessed no authority to seize B's goods.<sup>1</sup> It is submitted that, if the Amin had no authority to seize B's goods, resistance to his seizure could not be punished under this section. The words "lawful authority" here used cannot cover an act "not strictly justifiable by law."

1836. Apart from authority, there is no reason to hold that this section must be read as subject to section 99. In one sense all sections are subject to the provisions of the chapter in which section 99 occurs. But then that section was never intended to enlarge the criminal liability of the accused, as elsewhere defined, and even if so, it does not necessarily follow that if the resistance to unlawful seizure is an offence it is so under this section.

1837. It has been held in several cases that a resistance to seizure of one's property on a spent<sup>2</sup> or a defective warrant<sup>3</sup> is not punishable either under this or section 186. Where, therefore, a warrant did not bear the seal of the Court issuing it,<sup>4</sup> or was executed after the date noted for its return, any resistance offered to its execution, could not be punished, because the officer executing it had no "lawful authority" to make the seizure.<sup>5</sup> Such was held to be the case where the warrant for attachment was only signed by the Court clerk<sup>6</sup> though in another case where he had added "By order" it was held to be sufficient.<sup>7</sup> So again, where the warrant was addressed to the bailiff of the Court, it could not be legally executed by the Nazir, and any resistance offered to his seizure would not be resistance to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of the Nazir so as to be punishable under this section.<sup>8</sup> It is, however, submitted that in view of the provisions of Or. XXI, r. 25 of the Civil Procedure Code this view is untenable and the contrary has been held in other cases.<sup>9</sup> (§§ 871, 899, 1872).

1838. Authority must be Known to the Accused.—There can be no offence under this section unless the accused knew or had reasons to believe that the resistance offered is to the taking of the property by the lawful authority of a public servant. (3) Belief in Authority Essential. In the case of superior Courts of plenary jurisdiction such authority may be presumed, but in the case of proceedings of an inferior Court of limited jurisdiction, it cannot be presumed, but must appear from the proceedings which must set forth the facts and orders not being general Statutes of which all Courts must take notice.<sup>10</sup> So where it did not appear on the face of the conviction that the Mamlatdar was an officer to whom under the provisions of section 129 of the Land Revenue Code<sup>11</sup> the powers of the Collector constituted by section 87 of the Code, had been delegated under any general or special order of the Government, nor that the Karkoon employed to distrain was an officer directed to perform that duty by the Commissioner, under the orders of Government, a person resisting such a Karkoon by force when the latter came to distrain some goods at his house, was held not to be guilty of an offence under this section.<sup>12</sup> In order to give notice to the accused of the sufficiency of the authority of the public servant, it is necessary that the public servant should have with him his authority, which must be shown to the persons affected thereby. So it has been held that where a public servant attaches property under a warrant in execution of a decree, he must have the warrant with him, otherwise the taking of the property is not lawful, and resistance to the taking is consequently, lawful.<sup>1</sup>

1839. No Offence.—In the foregoing discussion, several cases have been cited to show that non-compliance with the law contained in these sections vitiates the conviction. It is for the prosecution to prove whether the accused knew or had reason to believe that that person whom he resisted was acting under the lawful authority of the public servant. This failing the prosecution fails. (§ 1830). Secondly, the authority must be lawful, (§§ 1832, 1833). Thirdly, the authority must be known (§ 1838).

184. Whoever intentionally obstructs any sale of property offered for sale by the lawful authority of any public servant, as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

[Property—s. 22.]

1840. Analogous Law.—This section was clause 168 in original Bill, and remains as it was then drafted. Its object is self-evident.

1841. Procedure and Practice.—The procedure applicable to an offence under this section is the same as for an offence under section 182.

1842. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That certain property was offered for sale.
- (2) That such sale was by the authority of a public servant.
- (3) That such authority was lawful.
- (4) That the accused obstructed such sale.
- (5) That he did so intentionally.

1843. Intentional Obstruction of Sale.—This section deals with the intentional obstruction of the sale of any property held by the lawful authority of a public servant. Like “resistance” the word “obstruction” implies some overt act done or physical means used to hinder the sale of property. The giving of notices by persons at such sales that they have a claim against the property may amount to obstruction, if the notices were not bona fide and were given merely for the purpose of injuring the sale. But if they were given in good faith for the protection of one’s interest, then there would be no obstruction. So there can be no obstruction of sale if during the pendency of the execution-proceedings the judgment-debtor executes a sale-deed of the property in favour of another. Such a deed is ipso facto void as against execution-creditor, whatever may have been the intention of the parties, it is at any rate not an obstruction to sale.<sup>2</sup>

1844. The word “obstruction” implies an attempt to defeat or delay the sale of property already commenced. The shying off of intended bidders by creating a false alarm in their minds would be such an obstruction. In fact, any act detrimental to the steady progress of the sale and calculated to retard it, is obstruction, provided that it was done with that intention. The use of physical force will, of course, be obstruction, if it was intended to delay it. The picking up of a quarrel with likely bidders or the auctioneer, falsely accusing him of partiality or irregularity are other instances of such obstruction met with in practice.

1845. The next section instances another case of such an obstruction, though it is made a distinct offence, as it is an obstruction of an indirect kind.

185. Whoever, at any sale of property held by the lawful authority of a public servant, as such, purchases or bids for any property on account of any person, whether himself or any other, whom he knows to be under legal incapacity to purchase that property at that sale, or bids for such property not intending to perform the obligations under which he lays himself by such bidding, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

[Legal incapacity—e.g., under s. 169.]

1846. Analogous Law.—This section codifies the pre-existing law as enacted in the regulation.<sup>1</sup> It deals with another case of obstruction to the public service.<sup>2</sup> It regards the bidding for property which the bidder knows will not end in sale, as a contempt and an imposition upon the public servant. Such an obstruction might have been dealt with under the last section; but as the bidding might be pleaded as the furtherance rather an obstruction of sale, this section defines what are the incriminating elements in such a case.

1847. Procedure and Practice.—The procedure applicable to this section is the same as for an offence under section 182.

1848. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That there was held a sale.
- (2) That it was by the authority of public servant.
- (3) That such authority was lawful.
- (4) That the accused bid for or purchased such property, either for himself or for another.
- (5) That the accused or the person for whom he bid was under a legal disability to purchase at the sale in question.
- (6) That the accused then knew of it.

Or instead of (5) and (6), prove—

- (7) That he bid for the property not intending to perform the contract so made.

1849. Principle.—This section penalizes delinquencies of two sorts: (a) where the accused bids for property without intending to purchase it, and (b) where he bids for it when he knows that he or the other person for whom he bids is legally disqualified from purchasing it. In the one case, the non-completion of the sale was due to his own volition; in the other, it was due to legal disability. In both cases the result is the same. The sale is infructuous, but in the former case, the failure of the sale was due to his direct omission, in the latter case there was no omission but incapacity of which he knew. In the former case the accused was guilty of breach of contract, but in the latter case, he may be anxious to complete the purchase by evading the law, but which he could not be permitted to do.

1850. Benami-bidders of public servants, who are disqualified from bidding at public sales, are thus within the rule. So are mock-bidders who bid only to put off the sale, by out-bidding a bona fide purchaser with no intention of completing it.

1851. Meaning of Words.—“At any sale of property”: The term “property” here includes any property corporeal or incorporeal. In short, it is used here in its widest sense as signifying anything that may be the subject of ownership. So the word “sale” is here used to denote not only a transaction by which ownership is transferred to the purchaser, but a transfer by which a limited interest for a limited period is conveyed in favour of the transferee. The lease of a ferry is an example.<sup>3</sup>

1852. “The Lawful Authority of a Public Servant”.—For the meaning of this phrase, see §§ 1863-1870. “Whom he knows to be under a legal incapacity”: A minor is not such a person; for he may purchase property through his guardian.

The legal incapacity herespoken of means an incapacity which disqualified a person from becoming a purchaser either directly or indirectly. "Not intending to perform the obligations," such as, acceptance of the conditions of the sale, payment of the price, and the like.

1853. Mock-Bidders and Illegal Purchasers.—This section is intended to strike at two classes of bidders—those who bid with no intention to purchase, and those who bid to purchase in spite of the law. The former intend to obstruct the sale by their mock-bidding, the latter may intend to secure a bargain in defiance of the law. The section speaks of any sale of property, but it uses those terms in their largest sense as including a transfer of any property whether corporeal or incorporeal, and indeed, of any right which is recognized by law as a subject of ownership (§ 1851).

1854. The section was accordingly held to comprise the lease of a ferry sold at a public auction by a Magistrate.<sup>1</sup> So where the accused bid for the lease of a ferry and when the sale was knocked down to him, he failed to complete it, in the hope of securing it at a lower rate on a re-sale, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.<sup>2</sup> In this case the Court inferred the accused's intention of not completing the sale from his subsequent failure to complete it. But this is not always evident, and the High Court before whom the case came up for revision, were not prepared to make such a presumption. The question in such a case is the bidder's intention, at the time of the bidding, and not what he did subsequently. Of course, his subsequent conduct may be an index of his original intention, but the question is one of fact to be decided upon the circumstances of each case.

1855. And this was the view of the Law Commissioners to whom was put the question, "Which is the criterion of bidding without the intention of performing all the obligation?" to which they replied: "We can only say that we see no need for any peculiar criterion." The fact that the bidder did not intend to complete the purchase must of course be proved by such evidence as is ordinarily admitted in similar cases.<sup>3</sup> Where, for example, the accused bid for the monopoly of a drug under a false name which was confirmed, whereupon he denied its purchase which was proved, he was held to have offended against this section.<sup>4</sup>

1856. So in the case of legal incapacity to purchase the property the question is one of knowledge. If a public servant requests another Benami Purchase. to purchase for him property sold at a public auction, and he purchases it in ignorance of the incapacity under which the public servant laboured, he could not be convicted of this offence. But if, on the other hand, he was aware of his incapacity, his purchase was in reality an abetment of the evasion of law of which the public servant was guilty. So where A was the Sub-Inspector of Police in charge of a cattlepond, and, as such, he had to sell a pony as unclaimed property. He knew of the legal disability under which he lay in purchasing it. He therefore asked one B to buy it for him from whom he subsequently purchased it. If B was in such a case bidding for A, B would be guilty of an offence under this section, as A would be of an offence under section 169.<sup>5</sup> If, on the other hand, B had purchased the pony for himself and then sold it to A, neither A nor B would be guilty of any offence under the Code. The question such a case raises, is then often difficult of proof; for the secret lies with the benamidar and the beneficiary, and it is not to the interest of either to disclose. Nevertheless, there may be circumstances from which the Court would be justified in inferring that in bidding for property, one was only the spokesman of the other who was himself disqualified from purchasing it.

1857. The case in which the purchaser himself labours under a legal disability presents little difficulty. For then the only question that remains is whether he was aware of it. And since every one is presumed to know law, the presumption will be that he was, though it will be open to him to show that he was not.

186. Whoever voluntarily obstructs any public servant in the discharge of his public functions, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Voluntarily—s. 39.]

1858. Analogous Law.—This is a general section on obstruction of public servants in the discharge of their public functions. Where the public servant is a judicial officer, an obstruction in the discharge of his public functions amounts to contempt of Court, and is, as such, summarily punishable under section 480 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and the offences may then be any of those punishable under sections 175, 178, 179, 180 or section 228 of the Code.

1859. Procedure and Practice.—The procedure applicable to an offence under this section is the same as for an offence under section 182.

- (1) That the accused obstructed.
- (2) That he did so voluntarily.
- (3) That the person obstructed was a public servant.
- (4) That he was obstructed in the discharge of his public functions.

1861. Principle.—This section deals with the general offence of obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public duties. The offence here made punishable is, of course, one not otherwise provided for (§ 1858). This section does not cast a halo of sanctity round all public servants, as such, irrespective of their duties. The gist of the offence lies in the interruption caused to a public servant whilst in the execution of his duties. It does not penalize obstruction at all times.

1862. Meaning of Words.—“Voluntarily obstructs” : The word “voluntarily” in this context indicates the commission of some overt act of obstruction, as distinguished from mere passive conduct.<sup>1</sup> The word “obstruction” means interruption or hindrance to the progress of work. “In the discharge of his public functions” : This necessarily means in the discharge of his lawful public functions, for functions which are not lawful cannot be designated public functions (§ 1867).

1863. Illegal Obstructions.—The three ingredients of an offence under this section are (a) that there should be an obstruction (§§ 1875-1876), (b) that it should be voluntary (§ 1876), and (c) that it should be in the discharge of the public functions by a public servant (§ 1870). This section is so generally worded, that if liberally construed, it would include many cases of obstruction specially dealt with in the other sections. Offences described in sections 183-185 would thus fall clearly within the ambit of this section. But, obviously, it was not the intention of the Legislature to include them in this offence, which must be understood to refer to other offences not elsewhere specially provided for. To what public functions must the section be then applied? The public functions, here spoken of, must, of course, mean legal or legitimately authorized public functions, and not any act that a public functionary might choose to take upon himself to perform.<sup>2</sup> The Police Inspector is entitled to make a search for cocaine; where therefore, the accused assaulted him and his constable while he was conducting such search he was held rightly convicted of this offence.<sup>3</sup> So was the accused in whose house the head-constable had found some stolen goods, whereupon he caused the door of the room to be closed and threatened to kill the head-constable if he removed the goods.<sup>1</sup>

1864. Where the Mamlatdar finding it difficult to execute a decree for possession of land referred the matter to the Collector who thereupon appointed a surveyor to execute the decree, and the latter was obstructed by the accused on the ground that neither he nor the Collector had authority to make a partition of the land. The accused was convicted of obstruction under this section, but Birdwood, J., quashed his conviction holding that the surveyor, acting under the Collector's orders, was not discharging a public function as the Mamlatdar could not legally refer his difficulty to the Collector, and the latter could not depute a surveyor to execute a decree. It was contended for the prosecution that section 99 protected the surveyor, and that the accused had no right to resist, but the Court held that section inapplicable on the ground that it did not protect an act which was altogether illegal.<sup>2</sup>

1865. The same view was taken in another case in which a partition Amin, in proceeding to measure certain lands, in the course of proceedings connected with the partition of an estate under the Bengal Partition Act,<sup>3</sup> was obstructed by certain persons who claimed the lands and objected to their being measured. The lands were stated in the report of the Amin to be the common land of estate No. 546, and of certain other estates. The persons who obstructed him were not co-sharers in that estate, and contended that the land ought to be measured had been divided amongst the maliks of the different estates and different portions of it had been held separately by them. The persons so obstructing the Amin were convicted of an offence under this section, but on revision the High Court quashed their conviction, holding that as there was no evidence of the community of interest, the accused were entitled to the benefit of the doubt, but for which, their case would have fallen under section 112 of the Partition Act under which the Amin would have had the jurisdiction he claimed. Otherwise, he could not measure the land without a special order from the Collector. As, however, the Amin persisted in measuring the land without such an order, he was not discharging his public functions. Here, again, the Court considered the applicability of section 99 and held that the only functions protected under this section were legal or legitimately authorized functions and not unauthorized functions however bona fide.<sup>4</sup>

1866. This view was reiterated by another Bench of the same Court in which the District Magistrate had issued a warrant for the appearance of a witness at an investigation by a police-officer, and the police charged with its execution were resisted, it being held that the only power which the District Magistrate possessed was to issue a warrant for the appearance of a person in his own Court, and that the warrant issued was ultra vires, and justified the obstruction offered to its execution.<sup>5</sup> So where the only right possessed by the District Board was to bridge a khal, they could not replace the bridge by a pipe even as a temporary measure, and the obstruction of the Local Board sircar, deputed for the purpose, could not therefore, be punished under this section.<sup>6</sup> So where a Magistrate issued a warrant of attachment to recover money paid to the accused as compensation on account of land, acquired under the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act, but afterwards given up, and the revenue peons sent to attach his property were resisted, it was held that as the issue of such warrant was justifiable under no law, the resistance offered could not be punished under this section, as the person who went to execute an illegal warrant could not be said to have been discharging his public functions.<sup>7</sup>

1867. These cases are then sufficient to establish the proposition of law that where an act sought to be done is not one which the person seeking to do it is legally authorized to do, an obstruction to the doing of the act is not an illegal obstruction,<sup>1</sup> though the person obstructed may believe in good faith that he was performing a public function, as where he is carrying out the orders of his superior officer,<sup>2</sup> for the question is not one of intention, but of the legal execution of public duty.<sup>3</sup> So a public servant executing a warrant of arrest bearing only the initials of a Magistrate and not his signature as required by section 75 of the Procedure Code, could not plead good faith to an obstruction met by him from the accused, nor could the latter be convicted of it under this section.<sup>4</sup> Moreover, even if the warrant had been duly signed and the serving officer did not "notify the substance thereof to the person to be arrested"<sup>5</sup> the latter could not be punished for obstruction, because the due formalities of law had not been complied with.<sup>6</sup> In such cases, Law says to its ministers: "I will protect you if you obey my behests; if you do not, you act at your own peril."

1868. The accused had owned a shop abutting on a public road vested in the Municipality. He had for forty years exhibited some of his wares on a strip of land in front of his shop which the Municipality claimed as their own. They first prosecuted him for an encroachment under the Municipal Act, but having failed, deputed one of their officers to remove the goods from the disputed land. The accused resisted and was then prosecuted under this section, but the Court held it to be a case of civil dispute and that in any case this section was inapplicable because it depended not upon the intention of the public servant but upon the discharge of his public functions which had to be found as a matter of fact and not as a matter of law: "His intentions may have been perfectly honest, but if in fact and in law, the functions in the discharge of which he was obstructed were not public functions, then no offence can be committed under this section. It is plain that the functions would not be public functions, if they fell wholly outside the jurisdiction of authority which he, as a public servant, possessed."<sup>7</sup>

1869. It was at one time held that resistance of process of a Civil Court was not punishable under this section or otherwise criminally. But there was no justification for such a view which has long since been overruled.<sup>8</sup>

1870. Public Function Not Strictly Legal.—There are, however, some cases in which the trend of the Courts has been to hold obstruction punishable, even though the act of the public servant was not strictly justifiable by law. This view proceeds upon the construction of this section in conjunction with section 99, the effect of which has been the subject of some discussion elsewhere (§ 1834). The cases in which this view has been countenanced, so far as they relate to this section, may, however, be here set out. In one case a subordinate police-officer had entered a house in search of property, without a warrant from an officer in charge of the police station. Such a subordinate could not legally enter a house in search of property without a warrant, unless he was in search of a person charged with the commission of a cognizable offence. The Court found that the subordinate had entered the house as much in search of such person as of property. If so, he was performing his normal public functions, and resistance to him would then be, of course, punishable.<sup>9</sup> No doubt Melville, J., went beyond the facts of the case in discussing the applicability of section 99 on the assumption that the entry of the policeman was not strictly legal and he held that "even though they (police subordinates) were not strictly justified in searching a house without a search-warrant, yet the prisoner cannot set up the illegality of their proceeding as a justification of the obstruction which he offered to the search." It is submitted that the dictum, so stated, is unsound. For, if it is once conceded that the words "public functions" must necessarily mean lawful public functions, the conclusion appears to be inevitable that the section cannot visit, with its penalties, persons who do not offend against its provisions, whatever section 99 might lay down. That section may make the conduct of the accused culpable, but if so, it may be punishable under some other section, but not under this, or those to which it is allied.

1871. In a Madras case a landlord had not tendered a proper patta to his tenants. Nevertheless, he distrained their cattle for arrears of rent and obtained the assistance of the police for the purpose. The tenants obstructed but were convicted for it, the Court holding that the distraint was carried out under s. 19 of the Rent Recovery Act. If so, there was no illegality to vitiate the landlord's procedure.<sup>1</sup> But another case of the same Court was decided upon facts which clearly bring that decision in conflict with the decided cases of the other Courts. In that case a Sub-Inspector of Salt and Abkari had attempted to enter a house in search of property without a search warrant, and it was held that though his entry was not strictly justifiable, still the person obstructing him could not set up the illegality of his proceeding as a justification of his obstruction, as it was not shown that that officer was acting otherwise than in good faith and without malice.<sup>2</sup> Such was held to be the case of a surveyor who being authorized to survey land entered a wrong estate with a view to measure land and to fix demarcation stones thereon. He was resisted and the resisters were held rightly convicted of this offence.<sup>3</sup> In another case of the same Court the tools of a potter had been attached in execution of a warrant for non-payment of the house-tax, and obstruction by the potter was held to be unjustifiable, though the tools attached were exempt from attachment, and the warrant had been issued after service of the notice of demand by affixing it to his house instead of serving on him personally, which was practicable and required by law. The Court held that as the provisions of the Local Boards Act<sup>4</sup> had been, in substance and effect, complied with, the accused was rightly convicted of obstruction.<sup>5</sup> These cases have been sufficiently passed in review elsewhere<sup>6</sup> and reference must be made to that discussion for the purpose.

1872. Of course, though the legality of the public function should, ordinarily, be obvious, still the person obstructed is entitled to show that so far as regards the legality of his act, he was legally and sufficiently empowered. Where, for instance, a warrant of attachment of a Civil Court was addressed to the Nazir for execution who indorsed it over to a peon for execution, it was held that the Code of Civil Procedure empowered such delegation,<sup>7</sup> for it only required that the warrant shall be delivered to the proper officer for execution, but it did not say that the proper officer should execute it himself, but that the delegation might well have been conferred in more clear and explicit terms. Nevertheless, the peon could not be said to have had no authority to execute the process and that the obstruction of the accused to him was therefore punishable under this section.<sup>8</sup> The same view was taken in another case in which it was held that the Nazir had authority to delegate the execution of warrant of arrest (§ 1837).

1873. Illegal Authority.—Where the exercise of authority is wholly illegal, there can be of course no lawful discharge of his public function by a public servant, for it is what the section implies.<sup>1</sup> Where, therefore, a warrant was issued against a minor for whom no guardian had been appointed, resistance to its execution is not punishable under this section.<sup>2</sup> So where the Munsiff who was proceeding to make a local inspection desirous of using a waterway to the locality, was obstructed by the accused who were no parties to the suit in which the inspection was sought, they were held to have committed no offence even though it was proved that their waterway was used by others, at least, by the residents of the locality.<sup>3</sup> So where there was a dispute between the accused and the Municipality as to the ownership of a plot of land, resistance by the accused to the entry of the Municipal Officer upon the plot was held to constitute no resistance.<sup>4</sup> The accused assaulted the Lambardars who had been invited by the Income-Tax officer to assist him in his inquiry; it was held to amount to no obstruction of the officer.<sup>5</sup>

1874. In a suit for accounts the Court passed a preliminary decree ordering the defendant to render and furnish accounts within one month from its date. On his failure, the Court purporting to act under Ord. XXI, r. 32 of the Civil Procedure Code ordered his arrest. He resisted. It was held that the Court had no power to order the arrest, since the decree was not one for "injunction" but only for accounts, in execution of which no arrest was legal.<sup>6</sup> So where the Munsiff issued a process for the attachment of moveables outside his jurisdiction, resistance to the execution was held to constitute no offence under this section.<sup>7</sup> Such was held to be the case of the accused who rescued his cattle from the custody of a Civil Court peon who had seized them in execution of a writ of attachment made in his absence, which did not bear the seal of the Court.<sup>8</sup> In another case, the Court having found that the judgment-debtor had removed his goods to the house of a third party (A) ordered their seizure by sealing up A's house which was contrary to Ord. XXI, r. 46 of the Civil Procedure Code. A resisted and his resistance was held justified.<sup>9</sup>

1875. Voluntary Obstruction.—The first question that arises in such case is : Was there an obstruction, and was it voluntary? (1) What is an Obstruction? The term "obstruction" occurs in several sections of this and the next chapters,<sup>10</sup> and it is used there as meaning actual hindrance, resistance, or obstacle put in the way of a public servant by the doing of some overt act, and not merely the offer of passive resistance, opposition or evasion not accompanied by the use of criminal force.<sup>11</sup> Any hindrance, whether by the use of actual force or otherwise, is not an obstruction in the eye of the Law though the use of actual force is not necessary to constitute obstruction. But the use of threats or threatening language would seem to be insufficient,<sup>12</sup> unless it was accompanied by an act such as brandishing of some kind of weapon<sup>13</sup> when the two taken together may have that effect. So if the accused stands in the way and prevents the bailiff from executing the process, or closes his door to prevent him from searching his house, and threatens to kill him, if he removes his goods, his act would amount to obstruction.<sup>14</sup> (§ 1877). So where a head-constable visited a police lock-up and objected to one prisoner giving his food to another and thereupon all the prisoners surrounded him in threatening attitude and gave insubordinate answers, they were held to have been guilty of obstruction under this section.<sup>1</sup> The same view was taken in another case in which a son of the accused Chedilal had strayed away from his house and was being escorted by the Chowkidar to the police station house. Chedilal intercepted him on the way and objected to his son being taken inside the police thana saying that he was not a thief. He snatched his son from the Chowkidar and the police moharir and used bad language. He was held to have committed an offence under this section, but the judgment does not disclose what "police function" the police were then performing, in which they were obstructed.<sup>2</sup>

1876. The fact that the conduct of the accused caused some annoyance to the public servant, does not of itself constitute obstruction. (2) What is Not an Obstruction? So where a Commissioner, appointed by the Civil Court to search the house of the accused for certain property, went to the house, but found himself face to face with a crowd, upon which he felt it unsafe to proceed to execute his mission, and thereupon the accused was convicted of obstruction under this section, the High Court quashed his conviction on the ground that the crowd collected was orderly and that the accused on hearing the order read out entered his house and closed its doors. "We do not think," the Court observed, "that mere failure to comply with the request of the Commissioner amounts to such obstruction as is contemplated in section 186. The use of the word 'voluntarily' seems to us to indicate that the Legislature contemplated the commission of some overt act of obstruction, and did not intend to render penal mere passive conduct."<sup>3</sup> (§ 1879).

1877. A person who chains from within, the doors of his house on the approach of a bailiff charged with the execution of a warrant issued by the Mamlatdar for the attachment of his moveable property, is acting within his rights, and cannot be charged with obstruction under this section;<sup>4</sup> though the case would be different if he threatened to kill him if he seized the goods.<sup>5</sup> There is no obstruction where a person merely objects to his arrest stating that it would result in a fight,<sup>6</sup> or if he objects to his house being searched, without using force or threatening language<sup>7</sup> or where he runs away to avoid his arrest.<sup>8</sup> Indeed, passive resistance, unless it is accompanied by menaces and threats, can seldom amount to obstruction.<sup>9</sup> So where a surveyor wanted to enter the accused's house for the purpose of measuring it, and the accused replied that he did not wish his house then measured and refused to accompany the surveyor as desired by him, it was held that his refusal was not an obstruction for which he could be held guilty under this section.<sup>10</sup> So there was no obstruction where the petitioners, the servants of a claimant, persuaded the tenants of an estate, not to pay their rents to a Receiver appointed by a Commissioner.<sup>11</sup> In this case the persuasion was addressed to the tenants in the absence of the Receiver, and it was therefore rightly held not to constitute obstruction. But it would probably have been very different if the same thing had been done in the presence of the Receiver and while he was collecting rents. But even then mere persuasion without something more would hardly have been sufficient.

1878. It was so held in the case of a vaccinator, against whom, while he was at work, the accused spread a report that the children vaccinated would go mad, hearing which the mothers who were in attendance with their children ran away, whereupon Shephard, J., said "To prevent by physical means persons willing to be vaccinated from being vaccinated might be obstruction of the vaccinator within the meaning of the section. But merely to dissuade a person from submitting to vaccination is another matter. That is not obstruction, for it is only with regard to willing patients that the vaccinator has any duty."<sup>1</sup>

1879. So where the tenants forbade a survey-measure from measuring land in a particular manner, without using or threatening to use force to prevent him from doing so, it was held not to amount to culpable obstruction under this section.<sup>2</sup> The same view was taken of a person falsely informing a vaccinator that he would get no children to vaccinate in the village.<sup>3</sup> It has been held in the Punjab that the obstruction here contemplated must be personal. So where during the sale of some nazul land by an Assistant Commissioner, the accused posted up placards asserting his own title to the land and warning bidders not to purchase it, it was held that the conduct of the accused in asserting his own title did not amount to obstruction; "on the contrary, a claimant is well advised in doing so, otherwise he might be told that he stood by and made no protest."<sup>4</sup>

1880. So a person preventing a vaccinator from taking lymph from the arm of his child could not be convicted of obstruction, because the vaccinator has no right to extract lymph without the consent of the parent.<sup>5</sup> And so, of course, the refusal of a cart-owner to give his cart on hire to a Government officer does not constitute the offence of obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions."<sup>6</sup> So the refusal of a merchant to deliver goods held by him as factor of the ward upon the assumption of the management of his estate by the Court of Wards till the general balance of his account is paid does not convert his refusal into a resistance or obstruction punishable under this section.<sup>7</sup> In this case the accused had claimed the factor's lien which took his case out of the section.

1881. An assertion of a bona fide claim is not an offence. So where the accused obstructed a Sanitary Inspector in fixing a door way in a temple wall and pulled out the brick foundation because he claimed the site as his own supporting it by evidence equally balanced he was acquitted of this offence.<sup>8</sup> There was, of course, no obstruction in the sense of this section, where the Patwari refused to show his accounts to the Kanungo which, though an act of insubordination, falls far short of penal obstruction.<sup>9</sup>

1882. Voluntary Obstruction.—These cases lead to the consideration of the question, what is a "voluntary" obstruction. This necessarily raises the question of intention. For there can be no voluntary obstruction, unless it was so intended. Where, therefore, a person obstructs a public servant in the honest belief that he was thereby protecting his rights, he could not be convicted of obstruction, whatever may have been the consequence of his act. So where a Magistrate in the discharge of his official duties directed certain persons to perform certain work on certain land from which they were ejected by the accused who believed that the men had been trespassing on the land of his friend, it was held that as the ejectment by the accused was to prevent what he bona fide considered to be trespass, he could not be said to have voluntarily obstructed them.<sup>10</sup> But while bona fide belief in one's own right will repeal the charge of voluntariness, proof of mala fides of the person obstructing the public servant is not necessary to sustain a conviction under this section.<sup>11</sup> In order to fix the accused with knowledge of the fact that the public servant was discharging his public function, it is necessary that he must disclose his authority. He must at least be ready to show it even though the accused may decline to see it.<sup>12</sup>

1883. Analogous Law.—Persons bound to furnish information to public servants are punishable under ss. 176 and 177. Persons bound to assist them are dealt with here. The section provides, first, in general terms, for the punishment when a person being bound by law to render assistance to a public servant in the execution of his public duty intentionally omits to assist ; secondly, it provides for the punishment when the assistance is demanded for certain specified purposes.<sup>1</sup>

1884. The insertion of this section was objected to on the ground that its inclusion in the Code might lead to much abuse. The Law Commissioners, however, justified it on the ground that it was in consonance with the English Law,<sup>2</sup> and they quoted the following observations of the English Law Commissioners as applicable to this section : “ This is an enactment which is essential for the enforcing of general laws in the absence of any particular penalties annexed to disobedience. The penalties may be incurred, although the offender is not appraised by what acts and omissions he will incur them. This is an inconvenience, but a necessary one, for some means are absolutely essential for compelling obedience to the direct and peremptory precepts of the law, and one who is wilfully guilty of disobedience may be regarded as having acted criminally.”<sup>3</sup>

1885. The section was only generally worded to the time when these words were written. It only prescribed a penalty for intentional omission to give assistance to any public servant in the execution of the public duty of such public servants.<sup>4</sup> The section has since been greatly improved, and the enactment of sections 42, 77 and 128 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, further define the duties of the public in their relation to public servants, so that there is not now the same inconvenience which the English Law Commissioners deplored as a necessary concomitant of their legislation.

1886. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be initiated under this section without the previous complaint of the public servant concerned.<sup>5</sup> The procedure is, in fact, the same as in the case of an offence under s. 182.

Clause (1) :—

- (i) That the accused was bound by law to assist.
- (ii) That the person to be assisted was a public servant.
- (iii) That he was then in the execution of his public duty.
- (iv) That he omitted to give such assistance.
- (v) That he did so intentionally.

Clause (2):—

Prove (i), (ii) and (iii) as above, and further—

- (iv) That the assistance required was demanded—
  - (a) for the purpose of executing a legal process of a Court of Justice; or
  - (b) for preventing the commission of an offence, or of suppressing a riot or affray; or
  - (c) of apprehending an offender.
- (v) That the public servant demanding the assistance of accused was competent to make the demand.
- (vi) That the accused omitted to give assistance.
- (vii) That he omitted to do so intentionally.

1888. Principle.—This section deals with persons under a legal obligation to assist a public servant, as sections 176 and 177 deal with those who are similarly liable to furnish information. The liability to assist postulates the liability to punishment in case of wanton refusal. Such punishment need not necessarily be as on a conviction for an offence. But both under English law as well as under the continental systems, such a breach of duty is regarded as a misdemeanour punishable by a summary process, and it is also the object of this section.

1889. Meaning of Words.—“Bound by law to render or furnish assistance”; Rendering implies personal service, furnishing implies procuring service of another. The word “assistance” here referred to is ejusdem generis with the various assistance specified in the second paragraph. The word implies that the party who assists is doing something which, in the ordinary circumstances, the party assisted could do for himself.<sup>1</sup> “In the execution of his public duty,” which must, of course, be lawful duty. “Intentionally omits to give such assistance”: But such assistance need not be volunteered. It need only be given whenever called for. This is clear from paragraph 2. “Legally competent to make such demand”: Here not only the duty but the demand must be legal.

1890. Criminal Omission to Assist Public Servants.—The criminal liability of a person to an offence under this section depends upon his legal liability to assist a public servant. Such liability must then be established by the prosecution. For it is not implied, and cannot be presumed. Such liability may, however, be imposed on the public generally or any specified class of the public, or on a person under certain circumstances. For instance, under s. 78 of the Forest Act,<sup>2</sup> persons who exercise any right in a reserved or protected forest are bound to furnish information respecting the commission of a forest offence. Such a person, therefore, cannot be convicted for refusing to serve as a panch for the purpose of drawing up a panchnama with reference to certain wood alleged to have been illegally cut in a reserved forest, for the section does not oblige him to assist a forest-officer in this matter.<sup>3</sup> So while landholders are obliged by s. 45 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to give any information which they may obtain respecting the commission or intention to commit a non-bailable offence, it does not cast on them the duty to embark on an inquisition. Consequently, where the magistrate ordered them to get a clue of a case which they did not, they could not be convicted under this section.<sup>4</sup> But S. 42 of the Code of Criminal Procedure casts a duty on every person to assist the police in the arrest of persons and their prevention from escape; consequently where the police had lawfully arrested a person who lay down, and the police asked the accused for help to secure him, which he refused, the Court held him technically guilty under this section, but let him off with a warning.<sup>5</sup>

1891. So s. 103 (i) of the Code of Criminal Procedure empowers an officer making a search under Chapter VII of that Code to call upon two or more respectable inhabitants of the locality in which the place to be searched is situate, to attend and witness the search. It does not oblige them to do more, as, for example, to attest the search-list, and their refusal to do so does not expose them to the penalties of this section,<sup>1</sup> though if a person without a reasonable excuse failed to attend such a search he will be deemed to have intentionally omitted to assist a public servant so that he may be punished under this section.<sup>2</sup> The word "assistance" referred to in the first part is, observed the Court, "ejusdem generis with the various forms of assistance specified in the latter half. The assistance must have some direct personal relation to the execution of the duty by the public officer. The signing of the search-list required by s. 103 is an independent duty imposed on the witness. The word 'assistance' as used in the section, implies that the party who assists is doing something which, in ordinary circumstances, the party assisted could do for himself."<sup>3</sup>

1892. Intentional Omission.—Further, the mere failure to give assistance under this section is not penal, unless it amounts to intentional omission. In order to render a person liable for such omission it must be shown that (a) the accused was legally bound to assist, (b) that he had been called upon to render or furnish assistance, and (c) that there was a reasonable necessity for calling upon him to do so. The accused may then show that he was not legally bound, that there was no reasonable necessity, or that he had lawful excuse for not assisting in the manner required. So it has been similarly held in England, that in order to support an indictment against a person for refusing to aid and assist a constable in the execution of his duty in quelling a riot, it is necessary to prove: First, that the constable actually saw a breach of the peace committed by two or more persons; secondly, that there was a reasonable necessity for the constable calling upon other persons for their assistance and support; and lastly, that the defendant was only called upon to render his assistance, and that, without any physical impossibility or lawful excuse, he refused to give it; and whether the aid of the defendant, if given, would have proved sufficient or useful, is not the question or criterion.<sup>4</sup> Again, the section applies only to a direct refusal or omission to assist a public servant. It does not apply to a mere negligence to perform a lawful duty, as for example, to nominate a watchman on a vacancy occurring as required by law.<sup>5</sup>

1893. This section will apply equally whether the person bound to assist was or was not a public servant. If he was a public servant he may be otherwise and additionally liable; but he is, in any case, liable under this section. It is apprehended that it is not for the accused to say that his assistance was wrongly demanded, if the demand itself was legal. For the measure of his liability to assist is the "legal competency" of the public servant, and not the propriety of his demand. For, if suppose that, in the case before cited, the fact that the search was improper and made on insufficient grounds would not absolve a person from assisting a public servant, unless the search was illegal, in which case it would affect his competency, so that the withholding of assistance would be not only right but proper.

188. Whoever, knowing that, by an order promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, he is directed to abstain from a certain act, or to take certain order with certain property in his possession or under his management, disobeys such direction, shall, if such disobedience causes or tends to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury to any persons lawfully employed, be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both;

to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Explanation.—It is not necessary that the offender should intend to produce harm, or contemplate his disobedience as likely to produce harm. It is sufficient that he knows of the order which he disobeys, and that his disobedience produces, or is likely to produce, harm.

Act—s. 33.]

1894. Analogous Law.—The provisions of this section were explained by the authors to forbid acts which may endanger the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience. The offence is subject to the provisions of clauses 2 and 3. A person cannot be punished “merely for disobeying a local order, unless it be made to appear that the disobedience is attended with evil, or risk of evil.” Thus no person can be punished for disobeying an idle and vexatious order.

1895. As instances of an order promulgated by a public servant may be mentioned those under sections 133, 136 and 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure,<sup>1</sup> and Orders under section 237 of the Indian Succession Act,<sup>2</sup> and under section 473 of the City of Bombay Municipality Act.<sup>3</sup>

1896. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without the previous sanction of the public servant concerned,<sup>4</sup> which cannot be dispensed with even where the Government issue an ordinance making the offence both cognizable and non-bailable.<sup>5</sup> But it has been held in Madras that since section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure only speaks of the necessity of requiring a complaint of the public servant concerned, or of some public servant to whom he is subordinate, that section is no bar to a prosecution for disobedience of the order of Government as an order issued by Government is not an order issued by a public servant, within the meaning of that section.<sup>6</sup>

1897. For the rest, the procedure applicable is the same as for an offence under section 182 of the Code. That is to say, the offence is non-cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

1898. A Magistrate is not competent to try and convict a person under this section of disobedience to his own order though issued in a different capacity. The offence being one issued in contempt of his own authority, the Magistrate is precluded from trying the offender himself.<sup>7</sup> He is, of course, the complainant and as such, he may either complain or sanction the prosecution as required by s. 195 of the Procedure Code. Indeed the Magistrate inquiring into such a case has not to assume the legality of the order the disobedience of which is complained. It is his duty to consider whether the order was properly made or not.<sup>8</sup> But so long as he has not to adjudicate upon the criminality of the accused under this section it is not for him to question the propriety or legality of such order where, however, it is the subject-matter of appeal or revision, it is only right that the Magistrate inquiring into the case should stay his hand, or otherwise, he may find himself overruled and his jurisdiction gone while he is proceeding with the case.<sup>9</sup>

1899. As regards the sentence that may be legally inflicted under this section, the distinction between the offences under the second and third paragraphs is noteworthy. For the only sentence that can be legally passed in a case falling under paragraph 2 is simple, while that falling under the next paragraph may be either simple or rigorous.

- (1) That there was promulgation of an order.
- (2) That it was by a public servant.
- (3) Who was lawfully empowered to promulgate the same.
- (4) That the order was directed to the accused.<sup>1</sup>
- (5) That the accused knew of the direction, which must be proved by positive evidence.<sup>2</sup>
- (6) That the order directed the accused to abstain from a certain act, or to take certain order with a certain property in his possession or management.<sup>3</sup>
- (7) That he disobeyed the direction.
- (8) That such disobedience—
  - (a) caused or tended to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of the same to any person lawfully employed;
  - (b) or caused danger to human life, health or safety, or caused or tended to cause riot or affray.<sup>4</sup>

1901. Charge.—The charge, if necessary, should run thus:—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“ That you——, on or about the——day of——, at——knowing that by a certain order, to wit——, promulgated by a public servant, lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, to wit——you were directed to abstain from (specify the act) (or to take certain order, with——with certain property, to wit——in your possession or under your management), disobeyed such direction, and thereby committed an offence under section 188 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

In one case it was said that the omission to specify the unlawful object or proof of quite another object are defects curable under s. 537, Cr. P. C.<sup>5</sup> sed qære.

1902. Principle.—Sometimes disobedience of the lawful orders of public servants carries with it its own penalty, for the law which sanctions the issue of the order also takes care to see that it is made duly enforceable. And when it is so, the public servant concerned has two strings to his bow: he may proceed under the special provisions which give him the power to enforce his mandate, or he may make him over to a Criminal Court to be dealt with under the section.

1903. Meaning of Words.—“Order promulgated by a public servant”: The word “promulgated” implies the publication of an order relating to safety, health or convenience of the public.<sup>6</sup> It does not include decrees, and orders of Civil Courts, e.g., one of injunctions.<sup>7</sup> The promulgation of the order by a public servant should not merely be general, but must directly affect the accused. That is to say, it must be directed to the accused, so that the accused may know that he is thereby placed under a legal compulsion, to take certain order with certain property in his possession. “Lawfully empowered”: A person may be legally justified, though not lawfully empowered. For instance, a Police Inspector may stop the playing of music if he apprehends a breach of peace, but he is not “lawfully empowered” to do so within the meaning of the section, which is limited to specifically authorized acts.<sup>8</sup> “He is directed to abstain from a certain act”: The order should not be merely general. It must be personally addressed to the accused, otherwise the accused, though aware of it, is not bound. “If such disobedience causes or tends to cause obstruction, etc.” : This must be read in the light of the explanation. Intention to cause obstruction is immaterial, if there was knowledge of the likelihood. “If such disobedience causes or tends to cause danger to human life,” that is to say, disobedience of the direction spoken of in the first paragraph.

1904. Disobedience of Order.—This section is again general, and deals with the disobedience of an order promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order. The essential ingredients of this offence are (i) promulgation of a legal order, (ii) its communication to the accused, (iii) its disobedience by him; and (iv) the injurious consequence as described in the section.<sup>1</sup>

1905. What is a Legal Order.—In the first place, then, there must be an order, and that order must have been passed by a public servant.<sup>2</sup> It must be a legal order, that is to say, if it purports to be an order under some law it must comply with all the provisions of that law.<sup>3</sup> For instance, if it purports to be an order under section 144 of the Procedure Code, it must necessarily be in writing and duly served or promulgated to the public as required by that section.<sup>4</sup> Such was held to be an order passed by the District Magistrate as head of the District Police prohibiting particular kinds of traffic on a road liable to obstruction during the day time.<sup>5</sup> So where a Magistrate having received a report of an accident to workmen employed in quarrying stones from a hill issued, presumably, a verbal order through some clerk to stop the work, and on receiving a report of its continuance summoned the accused and fined him, the Chief Court reversed the conviction holding both the order issued and the trial held by the Magistrate himself to be wholly illegal.<sup>6</sup>

1906. But apart from the provisions of the law under which an order is issued there is nothing in this section to require that it should be in writing, or, indeed, that it should be personally addressed to or served on the accused. Indeed, in the case of an order issued under section 144 of the Procedure Code such a service is neither always necessary nor possible.<sup>7</sup> A general order, though recorded in a proceeding to which the accused was not a party, if known to the accused, will bind him, if it falls within the terms of this section, and if no further formalities were required for its validity. An order passed under section 145 of the Procedure Code directing a person to abstain from the possession of another, would bind him though he was not a party to the proceedings.<sup>8</sup>

1907. Irregular Orders When Legal.—The question whether an order is legal or illegal must depend upon reference to the law or regulation under which it was purported to be passed. Here, again, the question depends upon whether the provisions complied with or departed from were mandatory or directory. If the former, non-compliance with it would be fatal to the validity of the order. If the latter, the order would be valid in spite of the irregularity.<sup>9</sup> So in an order under section 144 of the Procedure Code service of a written copy is directed to be made in the manner provided by section 134, which again provides, that the order shall, if practicable, be served on the person against whom it is made in the manner provided for service of a summons. Here then personal service is merely directory, and it does not go absolutely to the validity of the order. If, therefore, such an order was passed without personal service, that fact alone would not vitiate it so as to render disobedience penal under this section.<sup>10</sup>

1908. So under the corresponding section, it was held by the Full Bench in 1872, that a Magistrate may legally issue an order prohibiting a landholder from holding a haut on any particular spot on his estate on particular days, on the ground that such an order is likely to prevent a riot or an affray.<sup>1</sup> “A particular act or a particular mode of enjoyment of property might be perfectly innocent and lawful in itself. But the act may be done, or the property enjoyed in that particular mode, under circumstances calculated to lead to a serious breach of the peace attended with loss of human life; and it would be by no means proper or desirable to hold that, even in such case, the chief peace-officer of the district has no power to issue an order such as that contemplated by section 62 (now s. 144).”<sup>2</sup> The same view was taken by the Bombay High Court and under the same section.<sup>3</sup> So where a Magistrate issued an order to the owner of a temple to widen and heighten the door to prevent danger to human life, the order issued was held to be right even though it related to the private property to which the public had the right of access on payment of the customary offerings.

1909. But there is no law which enables a Magistrate to pass an order prohibiting the rival disputants to refrain from collecting rents until such time as the right and title of both parties should have been established by order of a competent Court,<sup>4</sup> though in such a case the Court would presumably have the power to attach the property pending settlement of the dispute. But an order directing a person to pay his rent to a certain individual is illegal, unless the latter person is a legally appointed Receiver.<sup>5</sup> In these cases, the property, though private, nevertheless affected the public generally. Such orders would then be justified on the ground that they relate to the protection of public rights, which would be regarded by the law of England as falling under the definition commune nocumentum.<sup>6</sup> But the case would be otherwise where the property did not affect the public generally. So an order calling upon the accused to make certain repairs to his well<sup>7</sup> or to prune the hedges of his compound<sup>8</sup> could not be legally passed under what is now section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

1910. Illegal Orders under s. 144, Cr. P. C.—So, it is not competent to the Magistrate under that section to prohibit the public generally from giving caste-dinners in a city during the prevalence of cholera.<sup>9</sup> So section 133 of the Procedure Code does not empower a Magistrate to order the owner of a house, standing apart from any public road, in its own compound, to repair such a house.<sup>10</sup> So an order issued by a Magistrate warning owners of cattle to take proper care of them, and not to allow them to run at large on the public roads,<sup>11</sup> or an order preventing a house-holder from building a wall in his own house, because it might result in a breach of the peace, are illegal, as they involve unnecessary interference with the rights of private property. So s. 62 of the Procedure Code of 1861 (now section 144) was held not to justify the passing of a summary order directing the owner of a tank in the deep bed of a river to destroy the banks on the ground that they were obstructions to the public in the lawful enjoyment of the river, and that the stopping of the water interfered with the health of the public.<sup>12</sup> Nor did that section empower the passing of any order which was, from its very nature, irrevocable. It did not, for example, empower the Magistrate to pass an ex parte order to cut down a large number of trees.<sup>13</sup> Here, the illegality was, however, more due to the order being ex parte than to its being an order to cut down trees. An order not to put stake-nets in a river is similarly illegal.<sup>14</sup>

1911. So no order could be legally passed under section 146 or section 147 of the Procedure Code directing a person to remove a fence so as to allow the use of an alleged right of way.<sup>1</sup> So the order passed by a Deputy Magistrate prohibiting persons from leaving their homes between 9 p.m. and sunrise and frequenting any public road or place whatever, was set aside as illegal.<sup>2</sup> So where certain inhabitants of the village A complained to a Magistrate that the inhabitants of B were extending their cultivation towards A, to the detriment of their pasturage, and thereupon the Magistrate issued an order forbidding the inhabitants of B from extending their cultivation in the direction of A, it was held that the order passed was illegal and its disobedience could not be held to constitute an offence under this section.<sup>3</sup> So an order forbidding the slaughter of cattle or sale of meat within a radius of three miles of a licensed slaughter-house can be supported by reference to no known law, and is therefore illegal.<sup>4</sup>

1912. An order may be intra vires; but it may be that the disobedience complained of does not contravene that order. Such was the case of the accused who were ordered not to make any disturbance over a certain person's rights of a ferry. They were convicted of plying another ferry at the site in question though they had caused no disturbance. The order for prosecution was quashed as infructuous.<sup>5</sup> An order under s. 518 of the Criminal Procedure Code being intended to provide for cases where a speedy remedy was desirable, it cannot have more than a temporary operation. Where, therefore, the District Magistrate had, by an order dated 7th February 1873, prohibited the passing of a religious procession with music except along a certain route, that order was no bar to the procession using other routes several years after.<sup>6</sup>

1913. So it was held to be illegal of a Burma Revenue Officer to order persons other than the grantees of land under the Burma Land and Revenue Act to take certain order with building on land, and the disobedience of such order is not punishable under this section.<sup>7</sup> Such was also held to be the case where the Sub-Inspector suspecting certain logs which were lying on trucks at a Railway Station to be stolen property ordered the Station Master to detain the same. The Station Master acting under the orders of his Superior Officer sent them on. It was held that, if the Police Officer suspected the logs to be stolen, his proper course was to attach them as provided in s. 550 of the Criminal Procedure Code. He had no right to detain them and his order being illegal the Station Master could not be convicted of this offence.<sup>8</sup>

1914. A verbal order to remove an obstruction has not the effect of a final order under s. 137 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and is not lawful, and a person disobeying such an order cannot be convicted under this section.<sup>9</sup> An injunction issued by the Civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure is not an order "promulgated" by a public servant. Consequently, its disobedience is not punishable under this section.<sup>10</sup>

1915. Justifiable Interference with Private Rights.—All these were cases of interference with enjoyment of a private right or right of property, which law discourages except in cases of extreme necessity. Whenever it sanctions interference, it does so in clear and unequivocal terms and under circumstances which must clearly appear.

a Magistrate may justifiably issue an order closing it.<sup>1</sup> So an order issued to the priests of a temple to heighten and widen the doorway so as to obviate the dangers from overcrowding and improve the ventilation was justified on the ground of public safety and convenience, and in accordance with what is now s. 144 of the Procedure Code.<sup>2</sup> So the plying of a boat for hire at a distance of three miles from a public ferry being prohibited by the Ferry Act, a Magistrate is empowered to pass an order prohibiting it, and its disobedience would be punishable under this section.<sup>3</sup> So a superior police-officer in charge of a police station is empowered to order an unlawful assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace to disperse, the disobedience of which would be here punishable.<sup>4</sup>

1917. Notice or Declaration for an Order.—As regards orders affecting rights unconnected with the enjoyment of property, the question depends upon the right possessed by a person and the legality of official interference with it. The section only deals with orders passed by public servants. A notice issued by the President of a Local Board under the Madras Local Boards Act,<sup>5</sup> calling upon a person to remove certain encroachment on a public road within a certain time is only a notice, and not an order within the meaning of this section, so that a person neglecting to obey it could not be convicted under it.<sup>6</sup> So an order which is no more than a declaration that, as between the parties to a contention, certain land in dispute does not belong to the public but belongs to one of them, is not one the contravention of which can be visited by a penalty under this section.<sup>7</sup> A mere declaration of a right as between parties is not an order within the meaning of this section.<sup>8</sup> So an order under this section applies to orders made by public functionaries for public purposes, e.g., an order under s. 145, Criminal Procedure Code,<sup>9</sup> and not to an order made in a civil suit between party and party. The proper remedy for disobedience of an order of injunction passed by a Civil Court is committal for contempt, and not a prosecution under this section.<sup>10</sup>

1918. Rights of Procession.—As regards the right of procession the Madras High Court has, in a well considered judgment, held that, in affording protection to persons assembled for religious worship or religious ceremonies, the Law points to congregational rather than private worship, and it may fairly be required of congregation that they should inform the authorities of the hours at which they customarily assemble for worship, in order that the rights of other persons may not be unduly curtailed. No sect is entitled to deprive others for ever of the right to use the public streets for processions, on the plea of the sanctity of their place of worship, or on the plea that worship is carried on there in day and night. Nor can such right be interfered with on the ground of custom for as Innes, J., remarked: "To constitute a valid custom it must be reasonable as well as certain and ancient, and it is not probable that any Court would hold that, to be a reasonable custom it requires the members of one section of the community to restrict themselves in their ordinary rights in recognition of the reverence due to a religion to which they do not belong."<sup>11</sup> Of course, where reasonable doubt exists as to the existence of a right, it is no doubt the proper course for the Magistrate to have regard to usage, although its existence may not depend on usage.

1919. On the other hand, if the Magistrate is satisfied of the existence of an emergency which falls for the exercise of the power conferred on him by section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure he is justified in suspending the exercise of rights, however well ascertained.<sup>1</sup> But an order of a Magistrate directing that all music should cease when any procession is passing a certain place of worship is ultra vires.<sup>2</sup> Of course, if persons passing in procession attended by a music pass a place in which others are assembled and engaged in public worship, which the music would tend to disturb, it is the duty of persons composing the procession to refrain from such disturbance; but assemblies for purposes of worship are held scarcely anywhere at all hours, but only at appointed hours, and then it is unnecessary that there should be a rule that persons should not at any time pass along a high road in the neighbourhood of a recognized place of worship if attended by music. If, indeed, the procession be of a religious character, the prohibition of it may be as real an interference with the free exercise of religion as in allowing it to proceed past an assembly engaged in worship attended with such circumstances as to disturb that worship, and if no religious procession is to be allowed to pass a recognized place of worship, whether persons are or are not at the time there assembled and engaged in religious worship, the members of a numerous sect might close every highway to the procession of a sect to which they are opposed, by erecting in the neighbourhood of each highway a place of worship.<sup>3</sup>

1920. Persons Not in Possession.—The disobedience of an order under this section is only punishable if it was passed in respect of property in the possession or under the management of persons against whom the order was directed. It will, therefore, be a sufficient answer to a charge under this section, if it is shown that the accused was not in possession of the property, though the order was passed against him. The possession here spoken of is actual possession, so that a proprietor of a theatre not in actual possession or management of a theatre at the time when a lawful order promulgated by a public servant was disobeyed, could not be convicted under this section.<sup>4</sup>

1921. Disobedience without Obstruction, Annoyance or Injury.—A mere disobedience of an order promulgated by a public servant is insufficient to warrant a conviction under this section. It must, as required by paragraphs 2 and 3 cause either obstruction, annoyance or injury to any person lawfully employed, or the disobedience must cause or tend to cause danger to human life, health or safety, or it must cause or tend to cause a riot or affray. But as regards “obstruction, annoyance or injury” or “danger to human life, health or safety” the “section only applies when the disobedience of an order causes those injurious results to people in the ordinary course of lawful employment to persons who, in the exercise of their rights as ordinary citizens may incur such evil consequences on account of any act or omission of the accused, which act or omission occurs in disobedience of a lawful order. The case of a riot or affray stands perhaps on a somewhat different footing.”<sup>5</sup> These observations were made in a case which a Magistrate had ordered the accused, an inn-keeper, to repair the gate of the inn to prevent thefts of traveller’s property; and on his failing to comply with the order he was convicted. But this conviction was set aside on revision by the Court which held the section inapplicable to such disobedience.<sup>6</sup> In order to make the disobedience penal all that the section requires is that—

(a) It had either caused or tended to cause obstruction, etc., to persons lawfully employed;<sup>7</sup> or

(b) It had either caused or tended to cause danger to human life, health or safety; or

(c) It had caused or tended to cause a riot or affray.

1922. It is only in case (a) that the order must injuriously affect persons lawfully employed. In the other two cases the requirements of the section will be complied with if the order is likely to cause danger to human life, health or safety, or if it had caused or tended to cause a riot or affray.<sup>1</sup> So where a Magistrate issued a notification that all persons desirous of carrying arms should take out a license, enabling them to do so, and the accused who were found carrying arms without a license were prosecuted under this section, it was held that assuming that the proclamation issued by the Magistrate under the orders of the Government to be a proper one, the accused could not be convicted for disobedience, for it was not shown that the carrying of arms tended to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury to any one.<sup>2</sup> In another case, during the outbreak of cholera, the Municipality were vested with legal powers to cope with the emergency. At that time, caste feasts were prevalent and the Magistrate ascertained that several deaths had followed from the eating of greasy and unwholesome food in insanitary lanes. The Municipality thereupon forbade the holding of caste-feasts exceeding 50 guests, and the accused was convicted of the disobedience of the order, but the conviction was set aside on the ground that the holding of the feasts had not been shown to entail the consequences specified in the section.<sup>3</sup> So an order issued by a Magistrate at the instance of one party against another, to remove the roof-drains on the eastern side of his house, was held to be unenforceable under this section, as it was not shown that the disobedience had caused injury to any one.<sup>4</sup>

1923. It has even been held that though the establishment of a haut in the proximity of an old haut and held on the same day may lead to a breach of the peace, still that alone would not justify the Magistrate in passing an order under s. 144 of the Procedure Code, nor will its disobedience be penalized under this section.<sup>5</sup> A Magistrate has, under section 144 of the Procedure Code, power to prohibit a person from holding a haut on a certain specified day, but he has no power to direct that it shall be held upon certain days leaving the party no option to hold his haut upon some other days than those on which his rival holds his haut. An order so worded is illegal, and its disobedience cannot be punished under this section. But apart from disobedience the Court set aside the conviction on the ground that there was no evidence that the disobedience was likely to lead to a breach of the peace.<sup>6</sup> Evidence on this point must be definite, and the fact that the dispute between two rival zemindars concerning two hauts close to each other was obviously likely to lead to a breach of the peace is insufficient, and does not dispense with the necessity of proof.<sup>7</sup> There is, of course, nothing to offend against this section where a man sells arrack in contravention of an order by the District Collector prohibiting its sales, unless its sale is attended by the consequence mentioned therein.<sup>8</sup>

189. Whoever holds out any threat of injury to any public servant, or to any person in whom he believes that public servant to be interested, for the purpose of inducing that public servant to do any act, or to forbear or delay to do any act, connected with the exercise of the public functions of such public servant shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years. or with fine, or with both.

1924. Analogous Law.—Both this and the next section deal with criminal threats affecting public servants. In the one case the threat is directed towards him, in the other it is directed against a person seeking his protection. This section applies to judicial officers as well as other public servants. The language of this section may be compared with that of section 503 of the Code which defines criminal intimidation. The offence here described is really criminal intimidation from which it is scarcely distinguishable.

1925. Procedure and Practice.—In all respects, including sanction, the procedure applicable to an offence under this section is the same as for all the preceding offences commencing with section 182.

1926. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused held out the threat.<sup>1</sup>
- (2) That the threat was directed against a public servant, or a person in whom the accused believes that the public servant to be interested.
- (3) That the threat was of injury.
- (4) That the object of the threat was to induce the public servant to do or forbear, or delay doing an act connected with the exercise of his public functions.

1927. Principle.—This section deals with the offence of criminal intimidation of a public servant, and it is intended to protect public servants from threats of injury, for which, however, the offender may be no less liable under the general section applicable to such offence.<sup>2</sup> The word "threat" should not be narrowly construed as meaning a mere effusion of passion unattended with any fixed purpose of doing harm. Such threats may technically bring the offender within the purview of this section, but then it may be a case in which the Court would have to consider the propriety of applying the provisions of section 95. Only threats uttered with the ulterior object of inducing public servants to do or forbear are here punishable. Other threats as for a past wrong, real or fancied, may be punishable as insult, if they conform to the requirements of that offence,<sup>3</sup> but they are not punishable under this section.

1928. Meaning of Words.—"Threats of injury" : See s. 44 Injury implies an illegal harm. A threat to complain is not an injury,<sup>4</sup> nor an institution of suit.<sup>5</sup>

1929. Criminal Threats to a Public Servant.—In order to constitute an offence under this section, there must be a threat of injury either to the public servant, or to any one in whom the accused believes the public servant to be interested. What the section deals with are menaces, which would have a tendency to induce the public servant to alter his action because of some possible injury to himself, or to some one in whom he is or believed to be interested.<sup>6</sup> It is of the essence of the offence that the threat should be uttered in order to influence the public servant against whom it is uttered. But what is a threat? Obviously it is a declaration of an intention to inflict injury, loss or pain on another. It is not a warning,<sup>7</sup> or a remonstrance, but an expression of the determination of one's mind to punish another in some way stated or understood. It is a threat, if it was meant to be so, whatever may have been the form of expression. Indeed, it is not the commission of the offence against the public order so much as the threat and corresponding apprehension of personal injury which are supposed to be inducements to the public servant to alter his course. "If a man went to a Magistrate in his Court, or to a police officer at the thanna and said, 'Unless you stop the Hindu procession I will commit a theft,' or 'I will commit a riot,' the mere fact that such offences often result in injury to persons, would not, I think, bring the language within this section. If, however, instead of merely stating an intention to commit the offence, he added words threatening personal injury, such as, 'Unless you stop the Hindu procession, I will commit theft of your property,' or 'I will cause a riot and attack you or your police force,' the words of the section would be satisfied."<sup>8</sup> So in a case where the accused was ordered not to interfere with the passage of the Hindu procession, the accused exclaimed that he and others would obstruct the carrying of a Hindu God along the road, even though they might lose their lives, and even though a riot might take place, it was held that it was a threat against the Hindus in whom the Magistrate and Police were interested, or that they were concerned in seeing that the Hindus carried their procession without molestation on the part of the accused. He was, therefore, held guilty of the offence here described.<sup>1</sup>

1930. The "threat" here punishable must be the threat of coming injury. It must be such as is likely to operate on the mind of the accused. A mere exclamation that the accused had suffered great injustice, or that he had been ruined by the order passed by the public servant, or that he and his children must poison themselves, for they knew not how to support themselves after the iniquitous order, may amount to anything, but it is not a threat of injury under this section. So again, since the word "injury" implies "illegal harm" caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property, the term is large enough to embrace threats of any kind affecting one in body, mind, reputation or property.<sup>2</sup>

1931. Again, the threat must be directed either against the public servant himself, or some one in whom he is "interested." This word has been used here as connoting interest of any kind, whether private, personal or official. So where a Magistrate passed an order allowing the Hindus to carry their gods in procession before a mosque, and the accused thereupon howled out "We will not allow it. If the god is carried in a procession we will obstruct, and it matters not if in this affair my life and the lives of our people are lost," he was convicted under this section, the Court holding that the threat was used against the Hindus in whose favour the Magistrate had passed an order and in whom the accused consequently believed the Magistrate and the police were "interested."<sup>3</sup> So an official superior is interested in his subordinate and the "interest" which one person may feel in another may thus be of the widest kind.

1932. Lastly, the intention of uttering the threat must be to induce the public servant to do or forbear. This is necessarily a question of fact depending upon the construction of words used by the accused, about which, of course, there should be no uncertainty.<sup>4</sup> Where the threats are a part of obstruction, the accused can only be convicted of s. 186 and not for threats separately under this section.<sup>5</sup>

190. Whoever holds out any threat of injury to any person for the purpose of inducing that person to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against any injury to any public servant legally empowered, as such, to give such protection, or to cause such protection to be given shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

1933. Analogous Law.—This section makes it a crime to threaten a man to prevent him seeking protection from a public servant empowered, as such, to give him protection.<sup>6</sup> The object of the rule is to prevent persons from lurking inquiry into their own crimes.

1934. Procedure and Practice.—The procedure applicable to an offence under this section is the same as for an offence under section 182.

- (1) That the accused held out the threat.
- (2) That it was the threat of an injury.
- (3) That it was intended to induce the person threatened to refrain or desist from making a legal application to a public servant against any injury (not necessarily suffered by him).

- (4) That such public servant was legally empowered, as such, to give the protection, or cause the same to be given.

1936. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—at—, held out a threat of injury to—(name the person threatened) by stating—(quote the words used) which words you uttered for the purpose of inducing the said—to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against any injury to wit—to—a public servant legally empowered as such to give such protection, (or to cause such protection to be given), and thereby committed an offence within my cognizance.

1937. Principle.—This section protects complainants against being threatened into inaction and thereby prevent the public servants from dealing with crime and wrongs which it is their duty to suppress and punish. But whatever may have been the intention of the threatener, the mere uttering of a threat is an offence, if it was intended to prevent a person from resorting to his legal remedy. So it will be an offence under this section if a Bishop were to say to a member of his congregation that he would excommunicate him if he persisted in defending a civil suit filed against him.<sup>1</sup> But in order to enable the Court to hold that the offence had been committed it will have to consider (i) whether the acts prohibited by the threat were such as the complainant was legally entitled to do, (ii) whether the ecclesiastical authorities had or had not jurisdiction to pronounce on their legality, (iii) whether or not the same authority had, under the circumstances, jurisdiction to pronounce a sentence of excommunication, and (iv) whether, if it did not possess that jurisdiction, but had exercised it in good faith and under misapprehension of law, such an exercise of jurisdiction would amount to an offence. As these questions, except the first, raised nice questions of civil right involving the consideration of the ordinances and practice of a particular ecclesiastical body, the Court postponed the exercise of its jurisdiction till the complainant had proved in a Civil Court the incompetency of the ecclesiastical authority to exercise the powers it had assumed either generally or in the particular case, and the legality of the rights they severally assert. The proceedings were consequently stayed, pending decision of the Civil Court.<sup>2</sup>

CHAPTER XI.

OF FALSE EVIDENCE AND OFFENCES AGAINST PUBLIC JUSTICE.

1938. Topical Introduction.—This chapter includes many offences unknown to the English law, which does not penalize false pleadings, which the Law Commissioners thought was a blot on the English law which should not be followed in this enactment. They have, therefore, included complaints, written statements, and pleadings, which generally, are required by law to be verified. If false, the verifier would be liable for making a false declaration and punishable under s. 193.<sup>1</sup>

1939. As regards the distinction between the making of a false statement and the giving of false evidence, the Code follows the recommendation of the English Law Commissioners, who observed that the great objection to the two being classed as one was "that they confound the aggravated offence of judicial perjury with the inferior crime of false swearing." They had accordingly drafted a separate clause to punish this minor offence, and this has been done in the Code.<sup>2</sup>

1940. Turning next to the last branch of the subject, that relating to the giving of false evidence, the Code again makes a noticeable departure from the English Law. Under the latter system the giving and the fabricating of false evidence are distinct, and treated as offences of varying degrees of gravity. The difference is justified by the authors on the ground of the difference in the standard of morality between the two countries. In England, direct evidence counts for much, and there is, therefore, no incentive to fabricate circumstantial evidence. In India where the credibility of witnesses is low, direct evidence, however great, is not regarded as of the same value as circumstantial evidence. Therefore, there is the more temptation to fabricate such evidence, and thus "a lie is often conveyed to a Court not by means of witnesses, but by means of circumstances, precisely because circumstances are less likely to lie than witnesses. These two modes of imposing on the tribunals appear to us to be equally wicked, and equally mischievous. It will, indeed, be harder to bring home to an offender the fabricating of false evidence, than the giving of false evidence. But wherever the former offence is brought home, we would punish it as severely as the latter. If A puts a purse in Z's bag with the intention of causing Z to be convicted as a thief, we would deal with A as if he had sworn that he saw Z take a purse. If A conceals in Z's house a paper written in imitation of Z's hand, and purporting to be a plan of a treasonable conspiracy, we would deal with A as if he had sworn that he was present at a meeting of conspirators at which Z presided."<sup>3</sup>

1941. These points of divergence necessitate other differences between the two systems, which will have to be presently considered.

191. Whoever, being legally bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth, or being bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, is said to give false evidence.

Explanation 1.—A statement is within the meaning of this section, whether it is made verbally or otherwise.

Explanation 2.—A false statement as to the belief of the person attesting is within the meaning of this section, and a person may be guilty of giving false evidence by stating that he believes a thing which he does not believe, as well as by stating that he knows a thing which he does not know.

Illustrations.

(a) A, in support of a just claim which B has against Z for one thousand rupees, falsely swears on a trial that he heard Z admit the justice of B's claim. A has given false evidence.

(b) A, being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z, when he does not believe it to be the handwriting of Z. Here A states that which he knows to be false, and therefore gives false evidence.

(1) Cf. Note G; 2nd Rep., s. 165.

(2) S. 182.

(3) Note G.

(c) A, knowing the general character of Z's handwriting, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z, A in good faith believing it to be so. Here A's statement is merely as to his belief, and is true as to his belief and therefore, although the signature may not be the handwriting of Z, A has not given false evidence.

(d) A, being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he knows, that Z was at a particular place on a particular day, not knowing anything upon the subject. A gives false evidence whether Z was at that place on the day named or not.

(e) A, an interpreter or translator, gives or certifies as a true interpretation or translation of a statement or document, which he is bound by oath to interpret or translate truly, that which is not and which he does not believe to be a true interpretation or translation. A has given false evidence.

[Oath—s. 51.]

1942. Analogous Law.—This section defines the giving of false evidence, an offence which is designated "perjury" under English Law, but it is a term which has been advisedly eschewed by the Code, as reminiscent of the English Law, from which the Code differs on material points.

1943. The offence, as understood in the Code, comprises (i) a false statement made by a person, (a) bound by an oath, or (b) by any express provision of law; or (ii) a declaration which a person is bound by law to make on any subject; and (iii) which statement or declaration is false and which he either knows or believes to be false, or does not believe to be true.

1944. Under English Law, perjury at common law is defined to be a wilful false oath by one who, being lawfully required to depose to the truth in any proceeding in a Court of Justice, swears absolutely, in a matter of some consequence to the point in question, whether he believed or not.<sup>1</sup> Under English Law, to support an indictment for perjury it is on the prosecution to prove (i) the authority to administer an oath, (ii) the occasion of administering it, (iii) the taking of the oath, (iv) the substance of the oath, (v) the materiality of the matter sworn, (vi) the introductory averments, (vii) the falsity of the matter sworn, and (viii) the corrupt intention of the accused,<sup>2</sup> to which must be added (ix) proof by the testimony of at least two witnesses.<sup>3</sup>

1945. Now, in this respect the Indian rule is less rigid and does not require compliance with points (iii), (iv), (v), (vi) and (ix). In other words, while under English Law, the offence of giving false evidence requires strict compliance with all the necessary ingredients above enumerated, in an offence under the Code, neither the administration nor form of oath nor the materiality of the subject-matter of evidence averred to be false, the introductory averments or the number of witnesses are essential to constitute the offence.

1946. The comprehensive definition of false evidence given in this section follows a line of its own. It does not follow the English Law, but closely proceeds upon the lines of the Code Penal of France, regarding the law of "faux temoignage." Indeed, the offence here described admittedly differed in such important particulars from the English Law of perjury that the authors even eschewed that word coining a term of their own, which they could not be prevailed upon to adopt because they had so materially departed from its substance.<sup>4</sup> That word had, however, found currency in the Regulations,<sup>5</sup> but, nevertheless, as the offence described was in its nature and incidents different from that commonly comprised in that term, the codifiers did not suggest a false analogy by borrowing a term from law, which they had advisedly departed from.

1947. Principle.—The salient features of the offence of giving false evidence are the intentional making of a false statement or declaration by a person who was under legal obligation to speak the truth. The test of the falsehood is his belief, and not the intrinsic truthfulness of the statement. The giving of false evidence is thus the practising of fraud upon Court by making it believe as true that which the deponent does not believe to be true. As such, the offence belongs to the genus of offences concerned with the due discharge of their duties by public servants. The offence is thus a contempt of the Court, and the Procedure Code, therefore, requires that it must sanction a prosecution of the accused.<sup>1</sup>

1948. Three Essentials of False Evidence.—The offence of “giving false evidence,” as here described, comprises, at least, three essential factors; (i) Legal obligation to state the truth (§§ 1948-1979); (ii) the making of a false statement; (§§ 1983-1988) and (iii) belief in its falsity (§§ 1984-1988). The first ingredient is most important, and differentiates this offence from what may only amount to a minor offence, or no offence at all. The legal obligation to speak the truth may arise, as the section declares it, from either (a) the binding nature of an oath, or (b) an express provision of law to state the truth, or (c) a formal declaration required to be made by law. The first ingredient again postulates the competency of a person to bind one under the sanction of oath. And this is obvious. For no one is bound to take an oath unless it is administered by a person competent to administer it. And even if he takes an oath before a person not so competent, he cannot be subjected to the penalties of the offence described in this section, for the oath, though given and taken, was not binding on him. The sole criterion of this element is, however, the competency to administer an oath to the person who made the false statement. Its actual administration is under this law immaterial, though it is, of course, otherwise under English Law. For it requires that before a person could be convicted of perjury the officer must have the power not only to administer oath, but he must have in fact administered it, and the person accused of the offence must have taken the oath. If there was any omission in giving or taking the oath, it is sufficient to vitiate a conviction for perjury under English Law.<sup>2</sup> But under the Code the sole test is the competency of the authority before whom a statement complained of is made to administer it.<sup>3</sup> And the fact that the deponent was not intentionally<sup>4</sup> or inadvertently<sup>5</sup> not sworn does not affect his liability to speak the truth, and if he deposes falsely, he is liable to a prosecution for giving false evidence.

1949. This view has been combated by Mahmud, J., in a case in which, however, the same question did not directly present itself. For, there one Maru was convicted of kidnapping on the sole testimony of a girl by name Thakuri, aged eight or nine years, about whom the lower Court had remarked that, though she did not understand the obligation of an oath, she had been cautioned to speak the truth and “was a competent witness, as far as intelligence is concerned.” On appeal, the question was whether her evidence was admissible in view of her acknowledged incompetency to affirm, and Mahmud, J., held that it was not, since section 7 required that a witness shall affirm, and its provisions could not be neutralized by those of section 13, which provided against the inadmissibility of evidence on the sole ground of the deponent having omitted to take an oath. “How,” he argued, “a person who, by reason of tender years is unable to comprehend either the spiritual or the legal obligations of an oath or solemn affirmation can be regarded as competent to give evidence legally admissible, and to be understood to be liable to such penalties under the law, is a matter the reasons whereof I find myself unable to conceive.”<sup>6</sup>

1950. Curiously, however, this and the other cases<sup>1</sup> in which the question came up for consideration were all cases of infant witnesses in which the question whether the failure to administer an oath would render the witness liable to a prosecution for perjury was collateral to the main question about the admissibility of their evidence. But the two questions are necessarily identical and their determination depends upon the same principle, for if swearing is a sine qua non to the admissibility of evidence, then a person unsworn is under no legal obligation to state the truth, and his statement is neither admissible in evidence, nor can it be made the basis of a prosecution for perjury. On this point, but for the dissentient view of the Allahabad Court, the Courts are unanimous, and the combined effect of the two sections of the Oaths Act appears to be that, while the one section lays down the general rule, the other section lays down the effect of its non-observance. As Collins, C.J., observed in a case: "It maintains the legal obligation of a witness to speak the truth, while, at the same time, it provides against the possible failure of justice through a technical irregularity."<sup>2</sup> In this view there is a sharp conflict between the Indian and the English rule. As regards the persons authorized to administer oath, the Indian Oaths Act empowers (a) all Courts and persons having by law or consent of parties authority to receive evidence, and (b) the Commanding Officer of any Military station occupied by troops in the service of His Majesty. In the latter case, the oath or affirmation must be administered within the limits of the station, and must be such as a Justice of the Peace is competent to administer in British India.<sup>3</sup>

1951. The same Act provides that oaths and affirmations shall be made by persons such as (a) all witnesses, required to give evidence by or before any Court or person having by law or consent of parties authority to examine such persons or to receive evidence; (b) interpreters of questions to, and evidence given by witnesses; and (c) jurors. But it excepts a person accused in a case from his examination on oath.<sup>4</sup>

1952. In the case of an accused, his statements made, as such, cannot then be the subject of a prosecution for perjury. But an official interpreter, by the oath taken on assumption of the duties of his office, makes himself legally bound to interpret truly, and he may, consequently, be prosecuted for perjury, though he was not sworn in the case.

1953. As to persons competent to administer oath, the Oaths Act is generally worded, but it is clear that, as regards Courts having by law or consent of parties authority to receive evidence, the Act makes the competency to administer oath subject to the authority to receive evidence. Again, such authority is declared to depend upon law or consent of parties. Now under law, a Court of Justice is empowered to administer oath to parties and witnesses appearing before it in a judicial proceeding. But the power to administer oath is confined to the Courts whilst so acting. If, therefore, the Court was acting in some other capacity, it could not arrogate to itself the powers which the law had conferred upon it in a different capacity.

1954. Where, for instance the accused presented a document said to have been executed by his mother for registration before a Sub-Registrar. The latter having refused its registration, the accused appealed to the District Registrar, who was also the District Magistrate. The latter ordered his subordinate, a Deputy Magistrate and Deputy Collector, to hold an enquiry concerning matters raised in existed. The enactment of s. 13 as a part of that Act was thus probably intended to overrule this case.

(2) Viraperumal, 16 M. 105. The contrary held in Vedamuttu, (1868) 4 M. H. C. R. 185, was under the old Act of 1840, in which no provision similar to s. 13 of Act X of 1873

(4) S. 5, Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873); S. 342 (4), Cr. P. C.

the appeal. In the course of that enquiry the Deputy Magistrate examined the accused on oath as a witness, on which his prosecution for perjury was sanctioned, and the question was whether he was empowered to administer oath to the accused. The only Act under which such an inquiry could be legally held was the Indian Registration Act, and it was contended that the Deputy Magistrate holding the inquiry was an "officer acting in execution of the Act in a proceeding or inquiry under the Act" within the meaning of s. 82 (a). But it was held that that clause obviously meant an officer legally empowered to act in execution of the Act, and as the Deputy Magistrate had no powers whatever under the Act, and as he had not been given the registering powers by the Registrar under s. 11 of the Act his proceedings were in no sense in legal execution of the Act, and he was therefore legally incompetent to bind the accused by an oath.<sup>1</sup> Of course, the fact that a person had some powers under an Act would not legalize his proceedings in a matter unconnected with the exercise of those powers. If, for instance, in the case last supposed the District Registrar had referred the matter under appeal to the Sub-Registrar for inquiry, the result so far as the accused was concerned, would have been the same, for the functions prescribed by s. 74 of the Act were entirely in the Registrar himself, and he could not delegate them to the Sub-Registrar, and the latter's proceeding would thus be not legal execution of the Act.<sup>2</sup>

1955. The same principle runs through other cases which establish the illegality of the vicarious discharge of public duties. So under the Indian Stamp Act, the Collector is empowered to make allowance for spoilt stamps,<sup>3</sup> for which purpose he is empowered to require the claimant to make an oral declaration on oath.<sup>4</sup> Where, therefore, on receiving such a claim, the Collector made it over for inquiry to a Deputy Collector who examined him on oath and recommended his prosecution for perjury to the Collector who sanctioned it, it was held that as there was nothing in the Stamp Act to empower the Collector to delegate his functions (in this matter to the Deputy Collector), the latter was not legally empowered to administer oath, and that the accused could not be proceeded against either under s. 181 or s. 193.<sup>5</sup>

1956. The same view has been taken in a case arising under the Income Tax Act.<sup>6</sup> That case proceeded upon the wording of s. 19 of the old Act,<sup>7</sup> but it illustrates a principle which has a wider application. There the accused had filed a verified petition to the Tahsildar under s. 19 of the Act of 1869, objecting to his assessment. The terms of that section provided for the filing of a verified petition to the Collector, and added that false verification of such a petition shall be deemed to be an offence under this section.<sup>8</sup> It was held that, as the petition was filed before the Tahsildar and not before the Collector, it was not a petition to the officer empowered to receive it. The petitioner could not, therefore, be prosecuted for perjury.<sup>9</sup>

1957. So there is no power in a Magistrate to administer an oath to a person making an affidavit in a criminal case.<sup>10</sup> So a Court calling upon a pleader to explain his conduct under the Legal Practitioners Act has no power to make a statement on solemn affirmation. Consequently, where it administers to him an oath and examines him, he could not be prosecuted for perjury, as the administration of an oath being unauthorized, it does not "legally bind" the person to whom it is administered to state the truth.<sup>11</sup> But in such a case, though the Court has no power to swear the pleader concerned, the proceedings against him being judicial, it has authority to administer oath to those examined therein as witnesses. They would then be liable for perjury if they depose falsely.<sup>12</sup>

1958. The Court has doubtless power to examine witnesses in a judicial proceeding. But then it must be a judicial proceeding. A Necessity of a judicial proceeding. Magistrate holding an inquiry into the conduct of a village headman<sup>1</sup> or to discover and bring to punishment the writer of a scandalous petition against a former Magistrate is not conducting a judicial proceeding, so that it has no authority to administer oaths to persons examined by him.<sup>2</sup> So where a plaintiff filed a miscellaneous petition to the Judge of a district, complaining of the Munsiff having dismissed his case without examining his witnesses who were in attendance, and the Judge thereupon examined the petitioner and finding his statement untrue prosecuted him for perjury, his order was set aside on the ground that the Judge had no authority to administer oath in the proceeding which was authorized by no law, and that the evidence given being coram non judice, the accused could not be prosecuted for giving false evidence.<sup>3</sup>

1959. A fortiori an inquiry held by a Magistrate without jurisdiction is not a judicial proceeding in which he is competent to administer an oath. So it was held, under the Procedure Code of 1861, that a subordinate Magistrate conducting an inquiry in a case of murder and riot, not being so empowered under section 273 of that Code, was not competent to legally bind persons examined by it by an oath, and such persons could not be prosecuted for giving false evidence.<sup>4</sup> Such would be the case under the present Procedure Code if Magistrates of the second or third class inquired into a case exclusively triable by a Court of Session.<sup>5</sup> Nor could such a Court take cognizance of a case without committal, and any statement before it would be coram non judice.<sup>6</sup>

1960. In all such cases, the question is not whether the Court concerned had jurisdiction, but whether it had jurisdiction in the No judicial proceeding. case or proceeding in which the incriminating statement was made. So where a Magistrate instituted proceedings, purporting to be under section 202 of the Procedure Code, against the accused on receipt of information from the Secretariat, in the course of which he put him on oath, it was held that section 202 only contemplated the holding of a preliminary inquiry on a complaint, and that as the Secretariat information did not amount to a complaint, the proceedings taken were illegal, for, though taken by a Magistrate, they were not magisterial proceedings taken in pursuance of any authority given by the Code of Criminal Procedure.<sup>7</sup> So where an employee in the Telegraph Department of Government died leaving some money payable to him, one Pitam applied to the Department for its payment to him as the sole heir of the deceased. The latter was sent to the District Judge "for verification and orders". The Judge examined certain witnesses, including the accused as to Pitam's relationship with the deceased, and he was then prosecuted for giving false evidence. But it was held that the Judge's inquiry did not constitute a judicial proceeding and he had, therefore, no power to administer an oath to the accused.<sup>8</sup>

1961. So under section 164 of the Procedure Code as it stood in the Code of 1882, it was held by the Full Bench of the Bombay High Court that any Magistrate not empowered to make the preliminary inquiry in a case exclusively triable by the Court of Session, was not competent to record the statement of a witness under that section, and any statement so recorded could not form the basis of a prosecution for perjury.<sup>1</sup> Under the section as it then stood "every Magistrate" was empowered to record "any statement or confession," which certainly could not be construed to mean as held by the Full Bench. However, any doubt that there may have been on the subject has now been cleared up by the addition of an explanation to that section, which has the effect of overruling the view taken in Bombay. All the same the question of jurisdiction is always material, and as it is one upon which the prosecution must satisfy the Court, it must be established by clear and irrefragable evidence.

1962. "Bound by any Express Provision of Law."—Besides persons bound by an oath, there are those who are "legally bound by any express provision of law to state the truth" in which case the sanction of an oath is not necessary to place a person under a legal obligation to state the truth, for such obligation is created by an express provision of law. The provision of law must be "express," that is to say, it must be a provision which must state that a person making a declaration shall declare therein nothing but what he knows or believes to be true, and nothing that he does not believe to be true. This would be necessarily implied where a document is directed to be "verified," for the verification of a document implies a declaration that it contains a statement of facts which is true. Pleadings in a civil suit are thus required to be verified,<sup>2</sup> and it is provided by the present Code of Civil Procedure that for the purpose of verification the person verifying "shall specify, by reference to the numbered paragraphs of the pleading, what he verifies of his own knowledge, and what he verifies upon information received and believed to be true."<sup>3</sup>

1963. Under the old Code the provision as to verification was not expressly so stringent, though it was intended to lay down the same rule. But under that Code a practice had grown up to verify pleading in a stereotyped formula to the effect that the contents of the plaint were correct, or that the statements therein made were true except, as to matters stated on information and belief, and that as to those also the verifier believed them to be true. It is impossible to hold a person criminally responsible upon such vague verifications; for the former form may amount to no more than a mere certificate that the writing correctly represented the plaintiff's claim, and the latter is obviously too non-committal, for it says nothing as to what facts were sworn to by the verifier and what were merely stated on information and belief, and unless the Court can lay its finger upon a statement of the accused and say that it was false and knowingly so made by a person, he could not be convicted of giving false evidence.

1964. But where a verification is specific and deliberately false, there is nothing in law to prevent a person from being prosecuted for giving false evidence, though it is not evidence in the ordinary sense of the term so as to justify the passing of a decree upon its basis. In other words, the term "evidence" as used here is used in a narrow and special sense and does not coincide with its definition in the Indian Evidence Act.<sup>4</sup> So in a case decided under the old Code of Civil Procedure, the provisions of which have been reproduced in the present Code,<sup>5</sup> a person filing a plaint<sup>6</sup> or a written statement in a suit was held bound by law to state the truth, and he was liable to be prosecuted under this section for a false statement made and known or believed to be false. "For it must be remembered that the very essence of crimes of this kind is not how they may injure this or that party to the litigation, but how they may deceive and mislead the Courts, and thus produce the most mischievous consequences to the administration of civil and criminal justice."<sup>7</sup> But in order to expose a person to the liability of a prosecution for giving false evidence, there must be a false statement of fact and not a mere pleading made for the purpose of putting a plaintiff to proof of his case, or denying a document or fact for the same purpose. Where a document is not required by law to be verified, its false verification cannot be made the subject of perjury.<sup>1</sup>

1965. The rule is, of course, only applicable to allegations as to material and substantial facts tending to prove one's case or to disprove the case set up by one's adversary. This view was taken by the Courts at Bombay and Madras in the case of an application for execution which was then<sup>2</sup> as it is now required to be verified,<sup>3</sup> in which it was held<sup>4</sup> that the omission to specify an adjustment of a decree by the decree-holder, though uncertified and made out of Court, and though it could not be taken into consideration by the Court executing the decree under the prohibition enacted in section 258 of the Code (now Order XXI, Rule 2)<sup>5</sup> was still an omission, under section 235, [now Order XXI, Rule 11 (e)] of the Code of Civil Procedure which requires the decree-holder to state in his application for execution "whether any, and (if any), what, payment or other adjustment of the matter in controversy has been made between the parties subsequently to the decree."<sup>6</sup>

1966. These were cases of pleadings in a civil suit, but it is not necessary that in order to sustain a conviction for giving false evidence, the statement or declaration should be made in a matter necessarily judicial,<sup>7</sup> for the offence may be equally committed if a false statement or declaration is made before a Criminal or Revenue Court, only in each case it must be proved that there was an express provision of law under which the accused was bound to speak the truth.<sup>8</sup> So a petition of objection to the assessment of income-tax, filed before the Collector, under section 25 of the Income Tax Act is required by law to be verified, and a person subscribing a false verification to such an objection would be guilty of having acted contrary to the express provision of law to state the truth within the meaning of this section (§ 1978.)

1967. Affidavits.—Persons are frequently in the habit of filing affidavits, but such affidavits cannot be the basis of perjury, because in order to constitute evidence the filing of an affidavit must be authorized by any law for the time being in force. An affidavit otherwise filed has not the effect of a statement in which a person is legally bound to state the truth.

1968. Where, for instance, a District Judge had, acting under s. 95 of the Bengal Tenancy Act,<sup>9</sup> appointed a common manager, to whom the Judge ordered the accused to deliver certain accounts and papers, which he refused stating on oath an affidavit that he had no such papers, which he had, and were recovered from his house, whereupon he was prosecuted under ss. 193 and 199, the Court acquitted him on the ground that the Judge, acting under the Bengal Tenancy Act, had no authority to examine him and his affidavit was gratuitous, as there was no law or rule having the force of law permitting the use of affidavits in such proceedings.<sup>10</sup>

1969. So where a person applied to a Magistrate for the stay of proceedings on the ground that he had moved the High Court for transfer of the case, and that the Magistrate was prejudiced against him, because he had instigated the prosecution, whereupon he was prosecuted, the High Court quashed the proceedings holding that the Criminal Procedure Code, contained no provision empowering a Deputy Magistrate to administer an oath to a person making a declaration in the shape of an affidavit.<sup>1</sup>

1970. The provision of Law creating legal obligation to state the truth must be strictly construed. For instance, s. 174 of the Criminal Procedure Code empowers a police officer to inquire and report on cases of suicide and for this purpose the next section empowers it to summon and examine witnesses, the section directing that "every person so summoned shall be bound to attend and to answer truly all questions"; consequently, where a person was not summoned but voluntarily appeared before a police officer holding such inquiry and falsely accused, and that of murder, it was held that his evidence did not amount to false evidence since the obligation to speak the truth only rested with persons who had been summoned and not upon those who had appeared without a summons.<sup>2</sup>

1971. In such cases the three material questions that arise are: (i) Under the express provision of what law was the accused bound to speak the truth; (ii) was his statement false; (iii) if so, did he make it knowing or believing it to be false.

1972. Venial Falsehoods.—As it is the first essential of criminality under this clause that there should be an express provision to state the truth it must be clearly established by the prosecution, and the accused may, on the other hand, show that he was under no such obligation which will be a sufficient answer.

1973. The words that one "shall be bound to answer all questions"<sup>3</sup> do not amount to an express provision of law to state the truth,<sup>4</sup> and a person refusing to answer questions put to him by the police does not therefore incur the penalties of s. 193, or of s. 176, or of s. 187.<sup>5</sup> The express provision must not, only create an obligation to speak, but also to speak truthfully, and it is only then that a refusal or a false statement is made obnoxious to the penalties of law. A verified statement or petition denying an alleged compromise filed in Court did not, under the Code of 1859,<sup>6</sup> and does not now<sup>7</sup> require to be verified, and a person falsely denying a compromise cannot be proceeded against on the strength of this section, for false verification.<sup>8</sup> So while a plaint and pleadings require to be verified, a memorandum of appeal does not, and an appellant cannot be prosecuted for making statements knowingly false therein. So an application for the restoration of a case disposed of or dismissed in default, does not require to be verified, and a defendant applying by a verified petition for the rehearing of his case cannot be proceeded against for making a false statement in his petition.<sup>9</sup> So a petition for an order absolute presented under Regulation XVII of 1806 did not require to be verified, and a person verifying it gratuitously was held not liable to conviction for giving false evidence.<sup>10</sup>

1974. The accused in a criminal case is protected from the ordeal of examination as a witness in his own case, and he could not therefore be punished for the making of false statement upon oath or otherwise, so long as his case is sub judice, and his exemption continues whether his case is pending in the original Court, or in the Court of Appeal. He could not, therefore, be convicted of filing a false affidavit alleging that the Magistrate had convicted him without examining his witnesses<sup>11</sup> though, it is said, he may be convicted of perjury if he files a false affidavit in support of his application for transfer.<sup>12</sup> An accused illegally pardoned, as in a case not exclusively triable by the Court of Session, stands in the same advantageous position, for his examination on oath being illegal, he was not legally bound by an oath.<sup>1</sup> A statement recorded by a Magistrate under section 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure<sup>2</sup> has been held to be such as the law requires to be truthful, and as such even though it may be in the nature of a confession the deponent might be convicted of perjury if it is proved to be false.<sup>3</sup> This view is supported on the ground that the accused in the case had not made the previous statement under s. 164 qua accused but qua complainant. It was said that if the statement had been made qua accused then the Magistrate would have followed the procedure prescribed in section 364.

1975. There can be no doubt that s. 164 empowers the Magistrate to record (i) a statement "in such of the manners hereinafter prescribed for recording evidence," and (ii) a confession to be recorded and signed in the manner provided in section 364, so that while the former may be evidence the latter is not so for the purpose of this section. The legal obligation to tell the truth only arises if the accused was bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth. Now, since the former implies an authority to administer an oath, it follows that in each case the foundation of the offence is laid in the law which either empowers its officer to administer an oath or enjoins one to make a truthful statement. The fact that a Magistrate is generally empowered to administer an oath does not make all statements made to him subject to the offence, for it must depend upon the nature of the proceedings, since there is no law which compels a man to speak the truth at all times, even before a judicial officer. Bhagwandasa's case,<sup>4</sup> already cited, (§ 1959) illustrates the rule that even a judicial officer has no authority to administer an oath, when he is not properly seized of the judicial proceedings before him.

1976. Similarly, as there is nothing in the Indian Railways Act empowering a Magistrate to make an enquiry as to the true heir of a deceased railway servant, a person giving false evidence on oath in such proceeding cannot be legally convicted for an offence under section 193.<sup>5</sup> These were cases of judicial officers performing non-judicial acts. But an executive officer may at times possess the authority to administer an oath. Such power is conferred by s. 63 of the Registration Act<sup>6</sup> on a Sub-Registrar. A person, so examined and making a false statement, would then be liable to punishment both under s. 82 (a) of the Registration Act<sup>7</sup> as well as s. 193 of the Code.<sup>8</sup>

1977. These cases, therefore, merely illustrate the rule that the question whether a false statement is punishable under the Code depends upon a reference to the law creating a legal obligation to state the truth.

Of course, a person may have perjured himself and yet be not liable to a prosecution if the law which creates an obligation also requires the sanction of an officer named as a condition precedent to a prosecution. 1978. False Declaration.—The third clause provides against a false declaration made by a person “bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject.” A false verification in a pleading is a false declaration within the meaning of this clause.<sup>1</sup> There is, however, a difference between a false statement and a false declaration. The former may be verbal or in writing, but the latter is a formal statement made in writing and required by law to be so made. A false statement when it amounts to a declaration is punishable, though there may be no express provision of law under which it must have been true. But a false verbal statement is not so punishable unless it was expressly required by law to be true. A declaration as to one’s income under the Income-Tax Act,<sup>2</sup> or as to possession of a certain fire-arm under the Arms Act, or as to possession of contraband goods under the Customs Duties Act, or indeed, under any law whether general, special or local, would be a declaration made under the sanction of law, and as such, the declarant would be under the penalty for making a false declaration as here provided. A declaration may be required under the departmental rules of Government, but in such a case a false declarant does not expose himself to a criminal prosecution merely because a declaration was false, for the clause penalizes only those declarations which are made under the sanction of law, and not all declarations whatsoever. Of course, the declaration here intended does not comprise a statement which, though required to be in writing may, nevertheless, be false. A confession by an accused, in his statement made under section 342 of the Procedure Code are, for example, declarations which must be in writing, though they may as well be false.

1979. Again, the declaration must be made on “any subject” which presumably means that the declaration must be made on a subject specified in law. A declaration which goes beyond the specific subject upon which it must be made under law is not then a declaration to which would attach the penalty provided by this section. In other words, in order to be penal a declaration must be false on a point material to the object for which the declaration is made or used<sup>3</sup>; but the same limitation does not extend to a verbal statement which must be truthful whether on a point material or immaterial to the object for which it is required. This distinction though sound appears, however, to have been obliterated by the words “makes any statement which is false,” and which would, if strictly construed, include anything stated in a declaration though it may have nothing whatever to do with it. In other words, a false statement whether it amounts to a declaration or not would then be penal if it was made by a person who was bound as in the three opening clauses of the section, its materiality being immaterial. That this is so in the case of false evidence is clear from the section, and is supported by precedents;<sup>4</sup> that it is not so in the case of a declaration is equally manifest from the cognate sections which prescribe a penalty for making a false declaration.<sup>5</sup>

1980. The Statement must be False.—Another requisite of the offence of giving false evidence is that the statement made must be false, that is to say, it must be proved to be false by the prosecution. But should its falsehood be established by direct proof, or is it sufficient if it is improbable, indeed, so improbable that a prudent man ought under the circumstances of the particular case act upon the supposition that it was false? The former view has been maintained in some cases,<sup>6</sup> but it is opposed to the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act.<sup>7</sup> Of course, direct proof of the falsity of the statement on which the offence is based, is essential. But as to legitimate evidence for this purpose, the law makes no distinction between the testimony of a witness directly falsifying such statement, and the contradictory statement of the person charged, although not made on oath. Such a statement, when satisfactorily proved, is quite as good evidence in proof of the charge as the incriminatory statement of a person charged with any other offence, and on precisely the same ground that it is an admission of the accused person inconsistent with his innocence.<sup>1</sup>

1981. Of course, in the case of a witness making contradictory statements the Court is justified in convicting the accused, without finding as to which of the statements made by him is false.<sup>2</sup> But such a finding is only unnecessary in cases in which the two statements are so contradictory that one of them must be necessarily false. If, for instance, a witness were to depose that he saw A at a certain place and afterwards he were to swear that he did not see him there, the two statements are so contradictory that one of them must be necessarily false, and both of them cannot be possibly true. But if, suppose a witness were to swear that he saw A riding a grey pony and then he were to say that he was riding a black pony, the two statements are undoubtedly contradictory, but they are not necessarily both false, nor is even one of them necessarily so. In such a case the accused could not be convicted on the strength of the contradictory statements. The Code of Criminal Procedure only could contemplate a case of such direct contradictions. Indeed, the illustration given certainly presents such a case. A stated before the Magistrate that he had seen B hit C with a club. Before the Sessions Court, he stated that B never hit C.<sup>3</sup> Here one of the two statements must be necessarily false, for both of them cannot be possibly true.

1982. It may not be possible to establish the falsehood of any one of the two statements, but it is quite apparent that one of them is necessarily false. As such it was not necessary for A's conviction to establish which of the contradictory statements was false. The Procedure Code does not lay down a general rule, nor indeed could it do so, for the question is not one of procedure but sufficiency of evidence, upon which no general rule can be formulated. The contrary held by Straight, J., that in such a case "the charge must not only allege which of such statements is false, but the prosecutor must be prepared with confirmatory evidence, independent of the other contradictory statement to establish the falsity of that which is impeached as untrue,"<sup>4</sup> was based upon no sound principle and has been since overruled.<sup>5</sup> But, of course, as Holroyd, J., remarked: "Although you may believe that on one or the other occasion the prisoner swore what was not true, it is not a necessary consequence that he committed perjury, for there are cases in which a person might very honestly and conscientiously believe and swear to a particular fact from the best of his recollection and belief and from other circumstances at a subsequent time being convinced that he was wrong, and swear to the reverse without meaning to swear falsely either time. Again, if a person swears one thing at one time and another at another, you cannot convict, where it is not possible to tell which is the true, and which is the false."<sup>6</sup> This is only possible where the two statements are so irreconcilably contradictory that if the one statement is true, the other statement must be necessarily false, "for unless the two contradictory statements are so absolutely opposed as to exclude the possibility of any other hypothesis than that of the prisoner's guilt, there can be no conviction upon an alternative charge."<sup>7</sup> In such a case, it may be that both the statements were false, but it must be shown that both of them could not be possibly true." "It is possible, indeed, that the first statement may have been false through an error or mistake, which has been corrected by subsequent information, and that the second contradicts the first because it contains the truth which had come to the knowledge of the party in the meantime."<sup>8</sup> In such a case the two statements, though contradictory, are not "intentionally" so, and a conviction under section 193 of the Code may not then be possible, having regard to the terms of that section (s. 193).

1983. The falsity of a statement must then be established, but it may be established directly or indirectly, as much by the evidence of witnesses, as by the contradictory statements of the accused. In each case it must be considered whether the particular evidence offered is sufficient to induce a belief in the truth of the contradictory statement or direct testimony.<sup>1</sup>

1984. Falsehood must be Intentional.—Knowledge and belief by a party in the falsity of his statement is essential.<sup>2</sup> Indeed, such knowledge and belief is the very essence of criminality. For if a person did not know the truth, and made a statement respecting matters which he believed to be true, he could not be convicted, for that may at most amount to mistake due to ignorance or defective observation. This raises the question of intention. For a person knowingly making false statement does so "intentionally." And the question of intention raises the question of materiality, for though "materiality may not be essential to the offence, but it must be taken into consideration in arriving at the intention with which the false statement was made."<sup>3</sup> So Scotland, C.J., observed that though materiality of the subject-matter of the statement is not a substantial part of the offence of giving false evidence, still "in deciding whether or not it was intentional, the jury would have to consider whether or not the subject-matter of the statement were material to the result of the proceeding, inasmuch as, if that subject-matter were wholly immaterial, they might well attribute the statement to indifference or carelessness on the part of the prisoner."<sup>4</sup>

1985. This subject will be found further discussed under section 192 (§§ 2000, 2010-2015).

1986. Three Degrees of Knowledge.—The section deals with three degrees of knowledge: (a) a statement known to be false, (b) a statement believed to be false, and (c) a statement not believed to be true. A statement false to the knowledge of the maker requires no comment. It is the most flagrant instance of perjury which could be attributed to no other intention than the perversion of Justice. The question whether a certain statement was known to be false to the maker is one of fact, which must be decided on the proved circumstances of each case. The falsity must be known to the maker at the time of the making of the statement, for otherwise it may be that he believed in his statement at the time he made it, its falsehood being revealed to him afterwards when it was past recall. Knowledge is cognition and cognition implies conscious knowledge of facts. Such consciousness may arise from observation, or inference, but in either case it is knowledge if the consciousness was of the phenomenon called a fact. Where the representation of the phenomenon is not complete, there may be still consciousness of its existence, but it is a consciousness not directly arising from it, but one which arises from other facts contributing to the completion of cognition.

1987. These facts are in this connection spoken of as human experience. A person A may know that B hit C, but he may not know the weapon he struck him with. But he knows that A was in the habit of carrying a stick, and he knows that it is a handy weapon. He is asked with what weapon the assault was made and he replies, with a stick. Here the speaker did not know that B had hit C with a stick, for he had not seen him striking with a stick. The knowledge of a stick in such case implies visual perception of the stick, and so in many cases knowledge is synonymous with sensual perception. But it is not invariably so. For suppose B was seen getting into a room till then vacant, and C then entered it and then struck B. A saw both B and C enter the house after which B returned with a broken skull. Here A may truthfully say that he knew that C had hit B, though he had not seen him hitting the latter. But his knowledge though inferential is knowledge, though it may have been mistaken. For D may have entered the room by the back-door unobserved by A and hit B. In such a case, A's statement though false does not constitute false evidence, for it lacks the element of criminality, namely, knowledge or belief in its falsehood. But for the purpose of judging this, law has to look into his mind. It has to see what was passing therein at the time he made the incriminating statement—could it be deception or delusion. Did he believe in his words or were they spoken with no faith in them? Such a case may present some difficulty for it may be a matter of double inference; inference on the part of the Judge or the jury as to what was then in the mind of the accused, inference by the accused upon which his knowledge or belief was based.

1988. But such inference is in both cases capable of analysis and judicial determination. It must, however, be based not upon the standard of a hypothetically prudent or reasonable man, but upon the standard of the accused. In short, the question is not what under the circumstances the accused as a reasonable man should have believed, but what he, as a reasonable or unreasonable man, did actually believe. If he was hasty in drawing conclusions, reckless in thought, the Court could not punish him for his haste or recklessness for he is to be tried for perjury and not for blundering reason. But there is a limit to such blundering beyond which the tendency of the Court is to hold blundering highly improbable. Perjury then begins and blundering ends. So it has been held that the making of a false statement, without knowledge as to whether the subject-matter of the statement is false or not, is legally a giving of false evidence.<sup>1</sup> Where, therefore, the prisoner Echan Miah who had had a long feud with the complainant, one day reported to the police that the latter had committed theft of his cloth, two cups and a pair of jars. The police searched the complainant's house and recovered a cloth, two cups and a pair of jars which Echan Miah and his witness swore to as being his stolen property. It was proved that the cloth bore the dhobi mark of the complainant, and the cups and jars were similarly proved to belong to him. It was held that Echan Miah had intentionally given false evidence in falsely swearing to the identity of the property, and as to his witnesses "they made the false statement, having in all probability, no knowledge whatever on the subject, one way or the other." Their offence was nevertheless, held to be of giving false evidence under the law, as they could not have believed what they deposed to be true.<sup>2</sup>

1989. Abetment of Giving False Evidence.—One person instigating another to make a false statement may not be guilty of giving false evidence, but he will be guilty of the abetment of that offence. But in order to hold a man liable for abetment, it must be shown not merely that he instigated the making of a statement, but also that it should be made falsely.<sup>3</sup> It is abetment equally whether the abettor instigates another to make a false statement or to suppress a true statement. A person asking a witness to suppress certain facts in giving his evidence would thus be guilty of abetment under this section.<sup>4</sup> So another who had instigated a witness to say that a certain person when arrested was found standing in a certain place which was not true, was held to have abetted an offence under this section.<sup>5</sup> So where a person falsely personated another witness, the scribe of a document and swore having as such written it, persons who set him up as the true scribe and thus cause him to give evidence as such, are guilty of abetment.<sup>6</sup> a public servant as such, or before an arbitrator, and that such circumstance, false entry or false statement, so appearing in evidence, may cause any person who in such proceeding is to form an opinion upon the evidence, to entertain an erroneous opinion touching any point material to the result of such proceeding, is said "to fabricate false evidence."

1990. Analogous Law.—This section has been extended since it was first drafted by the Law Commissioners,<sup>1</sup> by the addition of the words "or makes any false entry in any book or record or makes any document containing a false statement," after the words "any circumstance to exist." The section has been drawn in the light of observations of the English Law Commissioners who approved the language of the Code and had adopted it in framing their own draft Code.<sup>2</sup> As to this section the Commissioners remarked that the essence of the offence may be the deceit put upon the Court without any intention of injustice to another as in the illustration (c).<sup>3</sup> But the authors remarked: "We do not propose to punish a person for fabricating evidence with the view of escaping punishment, unless he also contemplated some injury to others as likely to be produced by the evidence so fabricated. If A stabs Z and in order to escape detection, disposes Z's body in such a manner as is likely to lead a jury to think the death accidental, we do not propose to punish A as the fabricator of false evidence."<sup>4</sup> But this is not the view taken of the section which has been held to apply to a fabrication apart from the question of injury, dishonesty or fraud as those concepts are understood in the Code.<sup>5</sup>

1991. Principle.—This section is generally worded, and applies to any "circumstances" whether it is caused by forgery or fraud, if its object was to supply false data upon which the Court might be misled into giving an erroneous decision, touching any point material to the result of the proceeding. The object of all these sections is the same—to purge the Courts of all extraneous influences, and to assure the proper administration of justice. The offence does not depend upon the question of injury, nor does it require the presence of dishonesty or fraud, apart from the fraud involved in imposing on the Court.

1992. Meaning of Words.—"Whoever causes any circumstance to exist": "Whoever" would include an accused person in a case. If, therefore, he is charged for selling adulterated ghee and he produces a false sample as passed by the health officer, he would be guilty under this section.<sup>6</sup> The words "causes any circumstances to exist" are not so general as the doing of anything. The words imply an effect produced due to the agency of the accused. "Or makes any entry, etc.": These words were only added to make the meaning of "any circumstance" more explicit. "Intending that such circumstance.....may appear in evidence," which means that the circumstance must be intended and not innocuous, and the result intended must be to injure some one through the innocent agency of the Court. "Judicial proceeding or in a proceeding taken.....before a public servant":

"Judicial proceeding" has been defined in section 4 (m) of the Code of Criminal Procedure and "public servant," by section 21 of the Code. The term "judicial proceeding" will have to be explained at some length (§ 2001). "Or before an arbitrator," who is a judge appointed by the consent of parties, and who, therefore, requires the same protection. It includes one or more panchas appointed by parties for the settlement of a matter in controversy between them. "To entertain an erroneous opinion," which means not merely a passing observation, but a definite order, or judgment though it may not be final. That opinion must be erroneous on a material point. In this respect the fabricator of false evidence enjoys an additional immunity not vouchsafed to a witness. Where, therefore, a document is produced which enables the Court to form not an erroneous but a correct opinion the person producing it cannot be held guilty of this offence.<sup>1</sup>

1993. What is Fabricating False Evidence.—Though the offence of fabricating false evidence is closely allied to the more general

(i) Falsity. offence defined in the last section, still it presents some distinguishing features which have to be noticed. The offence here defined contains five principal ingredients: (i) There must be the causing of any circumstance to exist, or making any false entry in any book or record, or making any document containing a false statement; (ii) it must be with the intention that it may appear in evidence; (iii) such evidence must be before a judge, arbitrator or public servant and (iv) that it may cause him to entertain an erroneous opinion, (v) upon any material point. A person who gives false evidence in Court makes a false statement, with what intention it is immaterial, but intention in the case of the fabricator is all in all. Again, while the question of materiality and the effect of his evidence in Court is immaterial in the case of a perjurer, they are two essential elements in the constitution of his crime. This difference is due to the different circumstances in which the offences of the two are committed. The one gives evidence in facie curiæ, in respect to which the Court demands that whatever he shall state shall be truth. The other perpetrates his crime behind the back of the Court. In his case, therefore, the question of materiality is material. In fact, but for the safeguards here presented, a person charged with fabricating evidence may incur the penalty for fabricating false evidence, though his act may have caused no injury and may indeed never have been intended to be used as evidence. So it has been held that the preparation of a false balance sheet does not amount to an offence under the last section,<sup>2</sup> and a fortiori it would not be an offence under this section.<sup>3</sup> The question of falsity is one of fact, already considered, but the intention to impose on the Court is then a cardinal element in the composition of the crime.

1994. A person may fabricate false accounts and he may, for so doing, incur the penalty provided by other sections of the Code. But unless his fabrication was accompanied by the intention of using the fabricated accounts in Court, he could not be convicted under this section. There may be no proceedings actually pending in Court—they may not have been even instituted, but the offence would be complete as soon as there is fabrication with that intention.<sup>4</sup> The fabrication here made punishable is the causing of any circumstance to exist, or making any false entry, or false statement in a document. It thus excludes all acts merely constituting preparation or attempt. If, for instance, intending to sue one on a forged bond, one purchases a stamp paper in the name of his intended debtor, that fact alone is said to fall short of an attempt; it is said to be only an act in preparation for which the Code prescribes no penalty.<sup>5</sup> But if even a word had been written on the stamp, the attempt, it is said, would have been complete, for then something would have been done towards the commission of an offence, which is the essence of that offence.<sup>1</sup>

1995. As Turner, J., puts it: "The endorsement of the stamp vendor forms no part of the document which, it may be assumed, it was the intention of the person who procures the endorsement to make on the face of the stamp-paper. The offence of forgery had, therefore, not proceeded beyond the stage of preparation."<sup>2</sup> But the facts which that learned Judge had to deal with were exactly identical, and still the accused was convicted for fabrication. "The object of the endorsement, made by the vendor of a stamp is to afford proof of the person to whom it is sold; and in suits brought on documents written on stamp-paper, it is the usual course, when the execution of the document is denied, to advert to the endorsement and to the stamp-vendor's memory assisted by the endorsement as evidence of the person to whom the stamp was sold, and, therefore, as evidence of the probability that the document was made by the person by whom the paper was procured."<sup>3</sup> He then went on to add that in the earlier case the accused was held not guilty of forgery, but the question whether he could not have been convicted of an offence under this section was neither raised nor considered. His view then was that the purchase of stamp in the name of another person with the intention of committing forgery constitutes fabrication, for which the accused may be justifiably convicted. This view has since been followed by another Judge of the same Court,<sup>4</sup> though no doubt, it leaves the accused, no locus pœnitentiæ,<sup>5</sup> but then as the section is worded it is difficult to see how any other view is possible.

1996. A person who purchases a stamp-paper in the name of another does abet the making of a false statement on any document, and if it is accompanied by the intention to forge a bond thereon, he could not but possess the intention to use it in evidence in a judicial proceeding, for he must know that such a proceeding is inevitable. It will certainly help to form an erroneous opinion concerning the debtor's indebtedness to him, which is a point material to the result of the suit. The question, however, remains, is the endorsement of a document within the meaning of the Code. It is, if it is "intended to be used or which may be used as evidence of that matter."<sup>6</sup> An endorsement of the name of the purchaser is not necessary under the Indian Stamp Act.<sup>7</sup> But it is provided for by the rules made by the Local Governments under section 74 of the Act. And the object is undoubtedly to prevent fraudulent manipulation of deeds.

1997. In such cases the act of the accused was intended to use in the Court an instrument for injuring another. But injury to another is not a component part of the offence. For a person may fabricate a document to screen himself from punishment, in which case he commits the offence without intending to injure anybody. So where a certain Municipality prosecuted a person for building without permission, and he pleaded permission, for which the accused, a Municipal clerk, was called upon to produce the papers, who finding them misled, forged the orders called for and produced them in Court. The original orders were subsequently discovered; he was thereupon prosecuted and the Court held his offence to fall under this section.<sup>8</sup> In another case, the accused altered the date of an instrument so as to bring it within time for registration, and the Court held that, though in the absence of dishonesty or fraud, the offence did not constitute forgery, still it amounted to an offence under this section.<sup>9</sup>

1998. The section strikes at a fraud practised on the Courts, and the fabrication of documents is but one mode in which it may be practised. The causation of any circumstance with that intention is sufficient to constitute the offence. Where the accused, intending to implicate their enemy, secreted some stolen railway pins in his fields and godown, they were held to be guilty both of an offence under this section as well as one under section 414, because the accused intended that their enemy might be convicted on the strength of his being found in possession of stolen pins.<sup>1</sup> The same view was taken in another case in which the accused had dug a hole intending to place salt therein in order that the discovery of the salt so placed might be used in evidence against his enemy in a judicial proceeding. But in this case as the accused had done no more than dug a hole, he was convicted only of an attempt.<sup>2</sup> The same view was taken in another case in which the accused who were informers to the police of possession of illicit salt by a person, who was their enemy, accompanied the Police Inspector as he went to make a search carrying concealed on their person a quantity of illicit salt in two earthen vessels, but which they could not deposit into the house, before their own apprehension.<sup>3</sup>

1999. Intended Use in Judicial Proceeding.—The causing of a circumstance or the making of a false entry or statement in a document must be intended to be produced as evidence in a judicial proceeding, or in a legal proceeding before a public servant, or before an arbitrator. Since the gist of the offence lies in the intended use in a judicial proceeding, it follows that it is not necessary that the judicial proceeding should have been pending at the time of fabrication. All that is necessary is that such proceedings were imminent and the document in question was intended to be used in such a proceeding.<sup>4</sup> The intention to produce it, as such, must be proved by the prosecution. For it is an integral part of the offence. The intention must be to produce it as evidence and that evidence must be before the Court, or other public servant, or arbitrator as stated in the section. Now, as it is there pointed out, not only must it appear as evidence, but it must be evidence upon a point material to the result of the proceeding in which it was intended to appear.

2000. In short, it must appear not merely as evidence, but as material evidence in the case. There can then, of course, be no fabrication, if it is not even admissible as evidence, for unless it is so admitted it is not evidence, much less material evidence which the section requires. This excludes the fabrication of documents which are anyhow inadmissible in evidence. Police-diaries furnish an apt illustration of this rule. Entries made therein by police-officers are inadmissible in evidence. They may be false and intended to be used as evidence, but being inadmissible as such, their author cannot be punished under this section. So where a police-officer who had suppressed a document entrusted to him to forward to his superior officer, made a false entry in his official diary that the document in question had been so forwarded, intending that, if he were prosecuted under the Police Act, for suppressing it, such entry might be used as evidence in his behalf to prove that he had so forwarded it, it was held that since the entry was not admissible on his behalf, though contrary to his intention, it might have been used against him, the accused could not be convicted for fabricating it under this section.<sup>5</sup> This case was followed in another case of the same Court in which it was pointed out that the fact that the special Police Diary is admissible in evidence to refresh the writer's memory, that alone did not render them material evidence, or indeed any evidence of any date, fact or statement therein contained.<sup>6</sup> Similarly, a false statement in the recital of title to property in a document, when not admissible in evidence against the person against whose interest such statement was made, furnishes no ground for a conviction under this section.<sup>7</sup>

2001. In many of the above cases the document might be admissible in some proceeding; but the section requires that it should have been intended to be used as evidence in a judicial proceeding. Now, what is a judicial proceeding? According to the Code of Criminal Procedure, it includes a proceeding in the course of which evidence is or may be legally taken on oath.<sup>1</sup> As an oath includes an affirmation<sup>2</sup> the power to take evidence on oath is the salient feature of a judicial proceeding. It thus differs from a non-judicial proceeding in which a witness may be examined, and may even be bound to answer all questions; but as the person examining him cannot administer an oath his statement so taken does not constitute evidence taken in a judicial proceeding.<sup>3</sup> All proceedings of a judge are not judicial, nor does the mere fact that the judge is legally empowered to administer oath make his proceedings necessarily judicial. In order to be judicial they must relate in some way to the administration of justice, or the ascertainment of any right or liability.<sup>4</sup> An inquiry is judicial if the object of it is to determine a jural relation between one person and another, or a group of persons; or between him and the community generally; but even a judge acting without such an object in view, is not acting judicially.<sup>5</sup> For instance, a Sub-Registrar making an inquiry for the purpose of determining whether he should register a document presented to him for registration, has not to determine the jural relations between parties arising out of the document presented for registration. His proceedings are, therefore, not judicial.

2002. So the Registrar on appeal, though he takes evidence, has the same limited function to discharge. His proceedings are consequently not also judicial. His inquiry is analogous to one by the Registrar of a High Court as to whether a clerk or other subordinate has done his duty properly. In such cases, the inquiring officer may possess some of the attributes of a Judge, but that alone does not convert his proceedings into judicial proceedings. As West, J., remarked: "A provision that a particular officer may, for particular purposes, be deemed a Court, does not warrant an extension of that provision so as by inference to produce a group of rules in conflict with the general system."<sup>6</sup> The definitions of the "Court" in the Indian Evidence Act<sup>7</sup> or of "judicial proceeding" in the Procedure Code, must then be regarded as framed for the limited purposes of those Acts, and could not be extended beyond their legitimate scope. So the investigation made by a police-officer under Chapter XIV of the Procedure Code, is not a judicial proceeding, nor does his examination of witnesses in the course of such proceeding under section 161 constituted evidence taken at any stage of a judicial proceeding.<sup>8</sup> Indeed, it was at one time even held that a Magistrate taking down the statement of a witness under section 164 of the Procedure Code in a case exclusively triable by the Court of Sessions in which he had no jurisdiction to make preliminary inquiry, could be said to be conducting a judicial proceeding<sup>9</sup> though this is a view which has since been overruled by the Legislature, and such examination can now no longer be regarded as otherwise than judicial.<sup>10</sup> The preliminary examination of a complainant by a Magistrate before deciding to take action on his complaint is a judicial proceeding, because it is a proceeding directed by law,<sup>11</sup> and more so because it is a proceeding in which the Magistrate had to determine the jural relation between him and the person accused.

2003. The same view must be taken of a magisterial inquiry under s. 144 of the Procedure Code,<sup>12</sup> or of an inquiry into the conduct of a pleader under the Legal Practitioners' Act.<sup>13</sup> In such cases, the term means nothing more nor less than a step taken by the Court in the course of the administration of justice in connection with a pending case.<sup>1</sup> In this case, a bailiff had been, at the beginning of the day, solemnly affirmed once for all, to speak the truth as to the service of summonses in all the cases coming before the Court that day, still it was held that though the witness had been so sworn, and the names of the cases in the day's list had not mentioned when the affirmation was administered, still he was liable under section 193 for making a false statement, because the oath was considered to have been made in a stage of a judicial proceeding.<sup>2</sup> Here the proceeding was judicial, though the mode of conducting it was irregular.

2004. But there are cases in which the proceedings can by no means be considered judicial. Such would be the case where a Magistrate makes an inquiry within the province of the police, as where he makes an inquiry to trace the writer of an anonymous communication charging certain persons with murder, but not with the object of ascertaining the truth of the accusation.<sup>3</sup> The same view has been taken in Bombay where an inquiry made by a Magistrate to bring to punishment two writers of a scandalous petition against his predecessor, was similarly construed.<sup>4</sup> So where a Sub-divisional Magistrate made a preliminary inquiry under the directions of the District Magistrate with a view to ascertain whether there was a prima facie case against a police-officer with a view to sanctioning his prosecution, the Madras High Court held the proceedings to be departmental and not judicial, so that a witness examined in such an inquiry could not be punished for giving false evidence.<sup>5</sup> So where the Telegraph authorities having had a claim made against them by the heir of a deceased employee, referred it to the District Judge for verification, and he thereupon inquired into his claim and examined witnesses, his proceedings were held to be non-judicial.<sup>6</sup>

2005. In cases other than judicial, properly so called, sometimes the Legislature expressly declares certain proceedings to be judicial. They will then be so regarded whatever may be their nature and character. For instance, proceedings under section 12 and Chapter IV of the Income Tax Act have been expressly so declared,<sup>7</sup> and so are proceedings before a Coroner.

2006. It has been already stated that a document might be fabricated against a future judicial proceeding. Such was the case of the accused who being a yearly tenant of the complainant's got a rent note prepared for a period of four years and had it registered without complainant's knowledge. It was held that since the note contained an admission against the interest of the accused it was admissible on his behalf and as it had been prepared against a likely suit for ejectment, the accused was punishable under s. 193.<sup>8</sup>

2007. The section is not, however, confined to a judicial proceeding, for it applies equally to a "proceeding taken by law before a public servant as such." But whether the proceedings be judicial or non-judicial, the section requires that they should be legal and authorized by law. This is especially necessary in the case of the proceedings of a public servant, for his proceedings are as varied as his duties, all of which do not enjoy the same legal protection. For instance, a forest-officer is a public servant,<sup>9</sup> and as such he is empowered to hold an inquiry into forest offence and in the course of such inquiry to receive and record evidence.<sup>10</sup> Where, therefore, the accused, a lessee of forest-revenues, in concert with his agent fabricated false accounts for production before the Forest Inspector, and the latter thereupon prosecuted them for fabricating false accounts for producing in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant as such, it was held that it did not amount to an offence under this section, the reason given being that the

Inspector was not empowered by law to hold an investigation, and take evidence in any matter at all. "His function seems to be purely ministerial, and no proceedings by way of investigation being provided for and regulated by law, the statement laid before him, though false, would not be false evidence fabricated so as to expose the fabricator to the penalties" of s. 193.<sup>1</sup>

2008. But where the accused in order to save an estate from forfeiture, made a false entry of rent received in a public book kept by him for the purpose of informing the Collector as to the rents which had been paid into the Collectorate, and as to what estate the rents were in arrear, so that he might take steps to enforce payment, it was held that his offence was rather one under this section than under s. 466 under which he had been convicted.<sup>2</sup> Under this clause, then, all that is necessary is that the proceeding should be "taken by law" and that it should be before a public servant. The term "public servant," has been, of course, used here in the same sense in which it has been elsewhere defined,<sup>3</sup> and proceedings taken by law before him must refer to all legal proceedings, or such proceedings which he took in accordance with the provisions of law.

2009. Lastly, the section refers in the same breath to proceedings taken before an arbitrator. An arbitrator is really a judge appointed by the consent of parties to adjudicate upon a matter in controversy between them. As such, his proceedings are essentially judicial, and they are, therefore, necessarily entitled to the same protection.

2010. Fabrication on a Material Point.—Two other ingredients are still required to complete the offence. In the first place, the fabricated evidence must be material to the issue, and in the second place, it must be such as to lead the Court or officer concerned to form an erroneous opinion touching any material point. Of course, if the fabrication is of a material evidence, it is likely to lead to the formation of an erroneous opinion on a material point. Otherwise the mere formation of an erroneous opinion is not enough to complete the crime, if the erroneous opinion was on a point not material to the case. The question whether a piece of evidence was or was not material in a case must depend upon the circumstances of each case. Where, for instance, the vendee had purchased a plot, correctly described by boundaries, but which was wrongly numbered in his sale-deed as "10" which he, after the registration of the document altered to "272," it was held that the alteration was innocuous, as it was not intended to confuse the identity of the property sold, which was otherwise sufficiently described. The alteration, had, indeed, brought the deed in accordance with the fact, and the accused could not, therefore, be convicted under s. 196, which must be read with this section.<sup>4</sup> In another case, the accused had made a hole in the wall of his own house, broken open a box belonging to his uncle of whom he was the next heir and removed the contents, to which he believed himself entitled, but as to which there was a dispute. His object in making the hole and forcing the box was to make it appear that the removal had been the act of thieves from the outside. He was tried for criminal misappropriation and fabricating false evidence, but it was held that he had committed no offence and that, inasmuch as there was no report to the police and no inquiry, he could not be charged with the fabricating of evidence under this section.<sup>5</sup>

2011. Where a patwari, knowing that certain documents were forged, made entries in his papers corresponding to, and based on, those documents, it was held that he had committed no offence under this section as he had made true entries of false facts, not false entries or false statements of true facts.<sup>6</sup> So in another case, the lessee executed a kabuliat in favour of a landlord without his consent, in which he falsely recited that an agent of the former had agreed to give him the lease of which the document executed purported to be the kabuliat. It was held that the document was not a false document, though it contained a false recital. It was also added that there was the absence of criminal intent necessary to constitute the offence.<sup>1</sup> The accused, a pleader, presented his power-of-attorney in a Civil Court only signed by his client, but falsely attested by a witness. He was prosecuted under this section, but it was held that as the document which was no part of the evidence in the case could not be taken into consideration in deciding it, and as the essential ingredients required by this section were wanting, the conviction of the accused could not be sustained.<sup>2</sup>

2012. Material Facts.—Immateriality in false evidence is never a ground for exoneration. It is only under this section that the question of materiality is relevant in this country. But English Law. in England, where the law of perjury is different (§§ 1942-1944), materiality plays an important part both in false as well as fabricated evidence. English cases are, therefore, instructive, only so far as they throw any light on the construction of this section. The word "material" there means evidence of such a nature as to affect in any way, directly or indirectly, the probability of anything to be determined by the proceeding or the credit of any witness; and a fact may be material although evidence of its existence was improperly admitted.<sup>3</sup> Hawkins says that he cannot find this matter anywhere thoroughly settled or debated, and, therefore, shall leave it to every man's own judgment which, from the consideration of the circumstances of each particular case, may generally, without any great difficulty, discern whether the matter in which perjury is assigned were wholly impertinent, idle, and insignificant, or not, which seems to be the best rule for determining whether it is punishable as perjury or not.<sup>4</sup>

2013. Under English Law, facts affecting the credit of a witness in a case have always been held to be material.<sup>5</sup> So where the accused was indicted for selling beer without license, he falsely swore that he had not on a previous occasion when charged for the same offence authorized a plea of guilty to be put in, and that such a plea had been put in without his knowledge and against his will. It was held that as this statement affected the accused's credit as a witness, it was material, and that he was rightly convicted of perjury.<sup>6</sup>

2014. The same view was upheld in another case in which the plaintiff had falsely denied his previous conviction in cross-examination.<sup>7</sup> In an indictment for bestiality, a witness falsely swore that the flap of the accused's trousers was not unbuttoned, and that his trousers had no flap, it was held that the statement was material.<sup>8</sup> So a statement that A did not write certain words in the presence of B was held to be material, inasmuch as the presence of B might be as material as the writing of the words.<sup>9</sup> At the trial of A for perjury in an affidavit filed by him, his signature was proved, but there was no evidence that he swore to it. The accused falsely swore that A had sworn it before the taxing master. He was held to have perjured himself on a material point.<sup>10</sup>

2015. So on a trial of A, the accused, called to establish his alibi, falsely swore that he had seen A at a certain house at the time of the robbery, that he had lived therein for the last two years, and that he had never been absent therefrom more than two or three nights together during that time. In fact, A had been confined in prison a whole year out of these two years. It was held that the second and third statements were material as tending to render the first statement more credible, and that the accused was rightly convicted of perjury.<sup>1</sup> The accused was sued for a debt as Burnard Edward Mullany. The Judge asked him his name and he replied "Edward." To the plaintiff's question he denied his name to be "Burnard," and said that he was "Edward" only. The suit was dismissed. The accused was then indicted for perjury and it appeared that his real name was "Burnard," but that he had latterly been known as "Burnard Edward." It was held that the accused's name was material as it had led the Judge to dismiss the action against him.<sup>2</sup> This case shows that a point, howmuchsoever immaterial, may become material by its relation to the matter in issue. The question of materiality thus is always a question, the determination of which depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case. A fact immaterial in one case may become material in another. But the degree of materiality is not to be measured. If a question was circumstantially material it is for the present purpose as material as one directly proving the issue.<sup>3</sup> It would seem that the materiality may in some cases depend upon the intention where, for instance, the accused erroneously thought that the period for obtaining the refund on a stamp was two months and so altered the date to bring it within time and the Court held him guilty though the period for refund was in fact six months.<sup>4</sup>

2016. Immaterial Facts.—The same observation may perhaps be made of questions regarded as immaterial. Equivocal statements have always been regarded as immaterial in English Law. Where a witness, being asked whether a certain sum of money had not been paid for two things in controversy between the parties, he replied that it was, though in truth it had been paid for only one of them, by agreement, that statement was held to be insufficient to sustain a charge of perjury.<sup>5</sup> So where the accused had been asked by a judge whether A brought certain number of sheep from one town to another altogether, he replied that he had done so; but it appeared that the sheep had been brought in two lots, it was held that the false statement was immaterial, because the substance of the question was whether he had brought the sheep, and the manner of bringing them was only a circumstance.<sup>6</sup> So where A beat B with a stick, and C swore to it saying that A had drawn his dagger, and beaten and wounded B, C's statement was held to be immaterial on the ground that the only thing material was the beating.<sup>7</sup> On the trial of A for garrote robbery on B, the latter was asked whether he had not met A with C on the previous evening and proposed to them to commit a burglary. B denied it, whereupon C was called and swore to it. B was then prosecuted, but his statement was held to be immaterial,<sup>8</sup> and so it was, because B's conduct had nothing to do with A's offence. So in another case, the accused was prosecuted for assaulting his wife, and a witness called for him falsely swore that he had seen the wife committing adultery, of which he informed the husband. But the statement was held to be immaterial as affording no ground of legal justification for the assault.<sup>9</sup>

2017. If the question of materiality is once settled the other question referred to in the section is not difficult of solution. For if the evidence was material to the issues and admissible, it may be presumed that the Court before whom it was tendered would entertain an erroneous opinion touching a material point. Of course, the section does not require that the Court should in fact have held such opinion. All it requires is that there should have been the possibility of its holding such opinion. It is not the actual mischief done, but the pitfall prepared that law reprehends and punishes. The Court trying one for perjury has then only to see if the Court was likely to go astray on the evidence produced. But this may sometimes raise a nice question. Suppose a person were to perpetrate a glaring forgery, which the Court was not likely to take into consideration in deciding the case in which it was filed, is he to escape, because of his clumsiness? The solution of the question is to be found in the words of the section which looks to the intention of the accused, and not to the result. If he intended to influence the Court, it is enough, though his appliance may have been crude and clumsy.

2018. Analogous Law.—Perjury in England is defined to be a wilful false oath by one who, being lawfully required to depose to the truth in any proceeding in a Court of Justice, swears absolutely in a matter of some consequence to the point in question, whether he believed or not.<sup>1</sup> The false oath must be “wilful,” that is taken with some degree of deliberation. If, therefore, it was occasioned by surprise or inadvertency, or a mistake of the true state of the question, it cannot be considered to amount to voluntary and corrupt perjury.<sup>2</sup> This is the sense conveyed by the word “intentionally” occurring in section 193. It was at one time stated that there could be no conviction for perjury unless it be sworn absolutely and directly, that is to say, the perjurer must swear from his own knowledge, and not merely from belief. If, therefore, he thought, remembered or believed in his statement, he could not be convicted of perjury,<sup>3</sup> but this doctrine did not long prevail, and Lord Mansfield, C.J., laid down “that a man may be indicted for perjury in swearing that he believes a fact to be true which he must know to be false”;<sup>4</sup> and this view was affirmed by all the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas. And so it was held by the Court of Queen’s Bench that, if a witness swore that<sup>5</sup> he thought a certain fact took place, it might not be difficult, indeed, to show that he committed wilful perjury, and the averment was as properly a subject of perjury as any other.<sup>6</sup>

2019. Again, perjury may be committed as much in a judicial proceeding before a competent jurisdiction, as in some other public proceeding of the like nature, wherein the King’s honour or interest are concerned, as before Commissioners, appointed by the King to inquire of the forfeitures of his tenants, or of defective titles wanting the supply of the King's patents. And when perjury is committed in a judicial proceeding it is immaterial whether it is committed before a Court of record or whether it is a Court of Common Law or a Court of Equity or Civil Law and whether it has relation to the merits of a case or in a collateral matter, as where one offering bail for another, swears that his substance is greater than it is.<sup>1</sup> So far the Indian and English views coincide, and so far the English cases may afford a fit illustration of the rule here enacted.

2020. But excepting these particulars, the English Law of Perjury, presents some distinguishing feature upon points which it is as well to note :—

(i) The English Law requires, as stated by Lord Mansfield, that the false statement must be "material to the question depending,"<sup>2</sup> and this has become an established principle of Common Law<sup>3</sup> which remains unaffected by Statute.

(ii) Secondly, under English Law at least two witnesses are essential to establish the charge of perjury. As Coleridge, J., observed: "The rule that the testimony of a single witness is not sufficient to sustain an indictment for perjury, is not a mere technical rule, but a rule founded on substantial justice; and evidence confirmatory of that one witness, in some slight particulars only, is not sufficient to warrant a conviction."<sup>4</sup> The same rule was laid down by Lord Tenterden, C.J.,<sup>5</sup> This rule does not obtain in India.<sup>6</sup>

(iii) In England the administration of an oath is a sine qua non of a valid charge. But this, of course, is necessary, but not indispensable in this country.

2021. Explanation 1 to this section has been amended by repealing the words "or before a Military Court of Request" after "Court-martial."<sup>7</sup> The two preceding sections define the offences for which this section prescribes the penalty.

2022. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted for an offence under this section without the previous complaint of the Court or public servant concerned as required by section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Section 643 of the old Code of Civil Procedure also prescribed a mode of dealing with persons guilty of this offence before them, but in view of the ample provisions of section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, this section was considered unnecessary, and has been omitted from the present Code. It has been held under s. 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code before its amendment that where perjury comprises contradictory statements made in two Courts, both Courts must sanction the prosecution, and by parity of reasoning both the Courts must now complain.<sup>8</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, or Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

2023. In the case of false statements made in the course of a deposition, all the statements constitute only one offence, and not so many offences as are the false statements. Two or more persons giving false evidence in the same case cannot be tried together, even though they might be the scribe and attesting witnesses of a forged document and had conspired to support it.<sup>9</sup> The same person was both the District and Sessions Judge. As District Judge he sanctioned the prosecution of a person. As Sessions Judge he heard the appeal against his conviction. The High Court justified the procedure on the ground that the question when he was moved to sanction the prosecution was different from that which he had to consider on appeal.<sup>1</sup> It is submitted that both the decision and its reasoning are unsound as it is wrong to make the prosecutor the Judge in his own case. A conviction without a legal complaint is bad and must be set aside.<sup>2</sup>

2024. Proof.—The High Court will not in its revisional jurisdiction interfere with a finding of the lower Court on a question of law which it finds not free from difficulty.<sup>3</sup> The points requiring proof are :—

(i) False evidence—

- (1) That the accused was legally bound to state the truth either by an oath or by an express provision of law (s. 191) ;
- (2) That as such, the accused made the statement or declaration ;
- (3) That he did so intentionally ;<sup>4</sup>
- (4) That it was false ;<sup>5</sup>
- (5) That he either knew or believed it to be false, or did not believe it to be true (s. 191) ;

to which may be added the following aggravating circumstance—

- (6) That such statement or declaration was made in a stage of judicial proceeding.

(ii) Fabricating false evidence—

- (1) That the accused caused a certain circumstance to exist, or made the false entry, or made the document containing a false statement (s. 192) ;
- (2) That he did so, intending that such circumstance, entry or statement should appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding pending or prospective<sup>6</sup> or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant<sup>7</sup> or in a proceeding before an arbitrator (s. 192) ;<sup>8</sup>
- (3) That the person conducting the judicial or other proceeding had to form an opinion upon the evidence in which such false evidence appeared ;
- (4) That the accused intended that person to entertain an erroneous opinion upon that evidence ;
- (5) That such erroneous opinion touched a point material to the result of such proceedings.<sup>9</sup>

2025. Grounds For and Against Complaint.<sup>10</sup>—Whenever the offence of perjury is committed “in, or in relation to any proceeding in any Court,” the Courts are prohibited from taking cognizance of it without the previous complaint of such Court, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate.<sup>11</sup> Complaint is only a pre-requisite when the offence is committed in Court, or in relation to any proceeding in Court. If, therefore, it is committed in or in relation to a public servant other than a Court, no complaint is necessary.<sup>12</sup> Such an offence would fall under the second paragraph of this section. A complaint made by the Court is revocable on appeal. For the purpose of satisfying itself as to the propriety of complaining or sanctioning a prosecution, the Court is empowered to make a preliminary inquiry.<sup>13</sup> The object of the inquiry and complaint is to ensure that the prosecution is instituted after due consideration,<sup>14</sup> and only when it would be in the interest of public justice that it should be made. The object of the law in requiring the intervention of the Court to prosecute, is to restrain the exercise of private spite,<sup>15</sup> and to protect persons from being prosecuted out of mere malice, ill-will or reckless frivolity of disposition.<sup>16</sup> The Court ordering a prosecution incurs a heavy responsibility in setting law in motion, and it is therefore essential that the Court should conclude its proceedings and have all the facts before it, before filing a complaint.<sup>1</sup> It is said that this offence is against public justice and that the person best qualified to say whether a prosecution should or should not be instituted is the Judge before whom the evidence was given and who had considered all the facts of the case.<sup>2</sup> This is, however, not the view of the Legislature who have provided for an appeal against the Court's order and it is the duty of that Court to discharge its duty unfettered by any notion of the infallibility of the trial Court.

2026. Again, no Court should entertain an application to prosecute, made by persons who are not parties to the suit or proceedings out of which the proceeding for complaint arises.<sup>3</sup> It is the duty of the Court before filing a complaint to satisfy itself not only that there are good and sufficient grounds for prosecution, but also that the evidence forthcoming is such as will suffice at least to establish a prima facie case against the accused.<sup>4</sup> Its duty in this respect is to see that by embarking on a course of ill-advised prosecutions, it does not stultify itself, for as was remarked in a case, "it would be disastrous if there were a number of prosecutions ending, not in convictions, but in acquittals. The result would be that, instead of putting down perjury, it would rather tend to encourage it."<sup>5</sup> Moreover, even where a person has perjured himself, the Court has still to see whether it should order his prosecution. It is desirable to give witnesses a locus pœnitentiæ, and an opportunity to correct themselves, and if they do correct themselves immediately afterwards or on a second thought in the same deposition, a prosecution for perjury would hardly be desirable.<sup>6</sup>

2027. Then again, no person could be convicted of perjury on a comparison of his two contradictory statements without giving him a chance to explain them.<sup>7</sup> He must not, of course, be examined on oath when he is called upon to explain, since it is as an accused that he is to be questioned,<sup>8</sup> and if his explanation is plausible though not probable, it justifies the Court to stay its hand.<sup>9</sup> Where a prosecution is instituted on two contradictory statements it is stated to be necessary that the complaining Court should be empowered to complain in respect of each of the two statements.<sup>10</sup> But this is only a desideratum when a conviction is bad in the alternative, otherwise one of the statements may be used as merely evidence of the falsity of the other. But in that case it does not follow that that evidence must be necessarily true so that the other statement must be necessarily false. In other words, where a person is prosecuted in respect of a statement, reliable evidence must be forthcoming about its falsehood. It is not furnished by his mere previous contradictory statement.<sup>11</sup>

2028. Though not an invariable rule, the Court should not ordinarily initiate a prosecution for perjury in a pending proceeding.<sup>12</sup> As the complaint of Court is subject to correction on appeal, it is necessary that its proceedings should be so framed as to satisfy the High Court from the record as to the correctness and propriety of the order passed.<sup>13</sup> It need scarcely be added that the District Magistrate cannot initiate a prosecution in a case, disposed of by a second class Magistrate.<sup>14</sup>

2029. The fact that there was a prima facie case against a person is not alone sufficient to justify the prosecution for perjury. For, Venial Perjury. as observed before, there may be other circumstances which may render his prosecution inexpedient or inadvisable. Such would be the case where the witness was called to give evidence against himself or against his relations<sup>1</sup> or the contradictions were immaterial,<sup>2</sup> or made by an uninterested and ignorant witness, or where the latter statement was a reversion to the truth from an original false statement<sup>3</sup> or where the perjury was merely technical.<sup>4</sup> Of course, in such a case it might be said that the witness had no business to make a first false statement, but then, as remarked by the Punjab Chief Court, "in such cases the grave danger of fixing a witness to an original lie, under pain of a sentence for perjury, must be carefully guarded against, and it is probably better that he should escape punishment for the prior false statement" than that his conviction should be an object lesson to those inclined to atone for their first wrong by a timely correction.<sup>5</sup> So in a case the High Court revoked the sanction for the prosecution of a boy-witness aged 11 years, holding his prosecution inadvisable in consideration of his youth.<sup>6</sup>

2030. In another case it was observed that sanction to prosecute ought not to be given when the intended prosecution is based on a series of statements, which were made in the course of cross-examination, which continued for more than a day, which were not absolutely irreconcilable and for which the accused had supplied explanation which went far to reconcile them.<sup>7</sup> Again, while an omission to administer the oath does not render inadmissible the evidence so given, still it is a question which the complaining Court cannot lose sight of.<sup>8</sup>

2031. A complaint to prosecute under the section must specify the Court in which and the occasion on which the offence was committed; What the Order must Specify. and where the offence is that of giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding, it should further specify the particular statements in respect of which the offence is imputed.<sup>9</sup> It has been a moot question with the Courts whether before sanctioning prosecution of a person under section 195 of the Procedure Code, it is necessary to give him notice, and allow him to show cause why an order against him should not be passed. There is, of course, nothing in the Statute Law to render the giving of such a notice obligatory, but at the same time it is a salutary rule of law that no judicial order to the prejudice of a party should be made without giving him a chance of being heard. The necessity of notice is then, though not obligatory, necessary in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion,<sup>10</sup> so that, while the absence of notice per se does not vitiate the sanction, it may be a fact which may affect the order as the accused may then show in appeal that the order was precipitate or illconsidered and passed without giving due weight to his representation. If notice is once issued, the Court cannot then pass an order without hearing the accused, or waiting for its service.<sup>11</sup>

2032. All these are, however, questions which arise in proceedings anterior to a prosecution under this section. Their legality or propriety can be questioned only in those proceedings, or on appeal from them. For in a prosecution under this section Irregularity How Far a Bar. it is not open to the accused to say that the sanction for his prosecution had been wrongly given, or that it was infected with an illegality which rendered it a nullity. The Court trying the accused cannot sit in judgment over the Court sanctioning the prosecution. It will assume its validity and proceed with the trial, until the sanction given is withdrawn or revoked. But though the Court trying the case cannot canvass the propriety of the sanction, it cannot but take notice of an illegality affecting the authority or jurisdiction of the Court. If, therefore, the sanction was given by a Court or authority incompetent to grant it, the Court trying cannot then presume that it was duly given, for it cannot presume blindly a fact which it can see is not a fact. It will then refuse to act on a sanction so given.

2034. Charge.—A charge is a precise formulation of the specific accusation made against a person, who is entitled to know its exact nature at the earliest stage.<sup>1</sup> Where a person is charged with giving false evidence in the course of a deposition, the incriminating passages stated to be false must be specified in the charge. It is not a proper charge to set out the whole deposition, and say that it contains false statements.<sup>2</sup> Such a course could be justified only when each and every statement in the deposition is alleged to be false.<sup>3</sup> So where the accused is charged in the alternative, it is not a proper charge to set out two long depositions which are in some respects contradictory, leaving the person charged to find out for himself in respect of which particular contradiction, it is, that he is said to have committed the offence.<sup>4</sup> Only the passages held to be contradictory must be specified in the charge, so that the accused may have his attention directed to the contradictions relied on against him, so as to enable him to prepare his defence accordingly. For this purpose it must set out the precise words used by the accused and not merely their substance or effect.<sup>5</sup> Not only must the false statements be specified, but the charge should disclose the Court before which and the date on which the statements charged were made.

2035. A statement in the charge that the statement was made, "on or about in June" is vague as it does not state the year and omits mention of the precise date on which the statement was made.<sup>6</sup> The charge should be framed on the English record prepared by the Magistrate, and not merely upon the vernacular record prepared by a clerk of the Magistrate.<sup>7</sup> So it was observed by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., that in an indictment for perjury, the deposition of the accused should be literally set out. If there be a blank in the deposition it cannot be supplied afterwards by looking at the context and that omission is fatal to the charge.<sup>8</sup> And not only must the exact words be set out in the charge, but they must be proved to have been uttered by the accused.<sup>9</sup> And if the false statement charged was made in the course of a judicial proceeding, the charge should specify the fact, and the particular stage of the judicial proceeding in which the false statement was made. A charge that the accused "on or about the 2nd day of April 1868 at Jessore, in the Court of the Joint Magistrate, being lawfully bound on oath to state the truth, intentionally gave false evidence in a stage of a Judicial proceeding, by stating, etc., "is clearly a defective charge inasmuch as it gives no notice to the accused that he is charged with having made a statement in the course of a judicial proceeding, or that any judicial proceeding at all was pending at the time the alleged false statement was made.<sup>10</sup>

2036. Where the accused is charged with giving false evidence on three different occasions, each occasion should form the subject of a distinct head in the charge. If the charge or any head of the charge is amended it ought to be made formally, should be explained to the accused, and it should appear on the face of the record.<sup>1</sup>

2037. The charge should run thus:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“That you——, on or about the——day of——, at——, in the course of a trial of——, before——, stated in evidence,——’ which statement you either knew or believed to be false, and did not believe to be true, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 193 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the Court of Session or High Court).

2038. Principle.—This section merely prescribes a penalty for the two offences defined in the last two sections, where they are described as false evidence and fabricating false evidence. The Legislature measures the gravity of these offences not by their nature and character, but by the nature of the tribunal before whom they are committed, and the two paragraphs here preserve the distinction in the varying maximum sentences to which offenders in the two cases are liable. The policy which has dictated the distinction is the difference between a crime perpetrated in the presence of the Court which is the sanctuary of truth, before whom the gravest issues are often tried, and those before whom matters of comparatively smaller consequences come up for decision.

2039. The essence of the offence of perjury lies in the “intention.” Is this an element superadded to those laid down in the two preceding sections? It appears not, because a person who gives false evidence as defined there must do so “intentionally” and the addition of this word in this section would seem to have been added only by way of emphasizing the first pre-requisite of criminal liability under this section.

2040. Meaning of Words.—“Whoever intentionally gives false evidence”: The definition of “false evidence” is given in section 191. This requires that it should be given “intentionally.” What it means will be seen presently (§ 2042) “In any stage of a judicial proceeding”: The meaning of “judicial proceeding” has been defined before (§§ 1958-1961). The clause means that the judicial proceeding must be continuing when the false statement was made. “In any other case” means other than a judicial proceeding, but in which the making of a false statement is an offence. Such cases are dealt with in sections 191 and 192. “An investigation directed by law”: The explanation manifestly refers only to an investigation made under the express provision of law. But would the clause include an investigation into the truth of a complaint made by a police-officer, under the orders of a Magistrate passed under section 202 of the Code of Criminal Procedure? No, because such investigation is not directed by law, but is made under law. But the clause is probably too vague, and may, if strictly construed, even include an investigation by the police, preliminary to challaning a case in Court. But such is not the intention of the clause. “An investigation conducted under the authority of a Court of Justice” includes an investigation by a Commissioner or the like legally appointed by a Court of Law.

2041. Intentionally Giving False Evidence.—The giving of intentionally false evidence whether in a stage of judicial or non-judicial proceeding is an offence punishable under this section. Such evidence must be “false evidence,” a term defined in and explained under section 191. In order to be punishable, such statement must comply with all the requirements of that section. The false evidence here made punishable may, however, be either false evidence as defined in s. 191, or fabricated evidence as defined in section 192. The penalty in each case is the same, if it is produced “intentionally” in a stage of judicial proceeding. But if it is produced in a non-judicial proceeding it is obnoxious to the lesser penalty described in the next paragraph. The gravity of the offence thus depends not upon the nature and character of the false evidence, but upon the form in which it is uttered. Law regards a Court of Justice as the sanctuary of truth, and the grave issues there tried render it necessary that false statements made before it should be visited with commensurately severer penalties. The division of the offence here made is then (i) false evidence given in a judicial proceeding, and (ii) false evidence given in a non-judicial proceeding. The two vary only in the enormity of the crime, but in other respects the ingredients necessary to constitute the offence are the same.

2042. What is "Intentionally."—In the first place, then, the false evidence must be given "intentionally" (§ 2041). This word was probably intended to convey the same sense as is conveyed by the word "wilfully" used in a similar context. In England, the question receives assistance from the additional requirement of law which makes materiality another necessary ingredient of the crime. If a statement was material the witness could not have made it through carelessness, inadvertence, or mistake. If it was immaterial, there is no crime, whatever may have been the intention. In this sense, the question of materiality is not irrelevant in this country. For as the question depends upon "intention" and "intention" depends upon materiality, the latter question becomes important, though not for its own sake, but as reflecting upon the question of intention, upon which the question of criminality depends. So Scotland, C. J., observed in a case that "in deciding whether or not it was intentional, the jury would have to consider whether or not the subject-matter of the statement were material to the result of the proceeding, inasmuch as, if that subject-matter were wholly immaterial, they might well attribute the statement to indifference or carelessness."<sup>1</sup>

2043. As there can be no offence if a statement, though false, was made without an intention to make it, and as it is only the intentional making of a false statement that law condemns and punishes, the question of materiality reflects upon the question in another way. For persons swearing falsely do so to influence the Court to come to a conclusion other than that at which it would not otherwise arrive. It is, therefore, their intention to forswear to facts which they consider material in a case, and to which alone, to be successful, the perjured statement must be directed. The perjurer consequently selects only material points for the purpose of his falsehood. He cannot risk the chance of breaking down the material part of case by lying on its immaterial aspects. His plan is to deliver a frontal attack.

2044. The materiality of statement is, therefore, always important in determining the question of intention. But the law does not require proof of materiality, but only of intention, and materiality is only one test of intention.<sup>2</sup> But it is not its sole test. For it may be equally inferred from other facts. If the statement was false, and known by the accused to be false, it may be presumed that the accused gave false evidence, intentionally. If the perjurer had a motive for giving false evidence, it would be a good proof of intention, but here again, motive is merely a test of intention, and not an ingredient of the crime. Where for instance, the accused a decree-holder had realized money due on a decree on three different occasions, for which he failed to give credit, his subsequent denial of receipt of money was held to have been intentional, for the accused had no reason to forget what he had received, and he had a reason for suppressing its acknowledgment.<sup>3</sup>

(2) The view of Knox, J., in Ganga Sahai, (1903) A. W. N. 68, in which he held it "to be a material element that the false evidence should be given, so as to cause the person who in such proceedings is to form an opinion on the evidence to entertain an erroneous opinion, touching any point material to the result of such proceeding" is manifestly incorrect; Babu Ram, 26 A. 509. Indeed the learned Judge seemed too incorrectly to have thought that the requirements of fabricated and false evidences were the same.

(3) Rhutton Ram, 2 W. R. 63. But proof of corrupt intention is not necessary to constitute the giving of false evidence as appears to have been assumed in the case; Amir Ali Khan, 3 N. W. P. H. C. R. 133.

2045. Then again, the motive of a person in giving false evidence may be to make his story more credible or consistent with itself, as where a witness adds details of which he has no knowledge, or where he suppresses facts discreditable to himself or to the person in whom he is interested. But the fact that a person had no motive for perjuring himself, does not make his evidence any the less false, if it was false, and the accused must have known or believed it to be so. But in such a case though the accused may be technically guilty, the Court will probably withhold its sanction for his prosecution, or the Court trying him will consider it an offence only calling for nominal punishment.

2046. So where the statements of an uninterested and ignorant witness were in the main to the same effect and the contradiction was only in detail, and the later statement was probably a reversion to the truth from an original false statement, the Court deprecated a prosecution under such circumstances, as it has the effect of compelling a witness to adhere to his original lie under penalty of a prosecution if he tells the truth.<sup>1</sup> In another case the Court observed that in such cases the grave danger of fixing a witness to an original lie, under pain of a sentence for perjury must be carefully guarded against, and it was probably better that he should escape punishment for the prior false statement than that he should pervert justice by adhering to it. Moreover if the conviction does not determine which of the two contradictory statements is false, the benefit of the doubt must be given to the accused, and the punishment must be on the assumption that the statement which is false is the one which involves the least guilt on the part of the accused.<sup>2</sup>

was based, and then denied those facts on oath on a subsequent occasion.”<sup>1</sup> It is, of course, the duty of the Court to see whether the statements can be reconciled or not. “The accused in a criminal case is merely on the defensive, and unless there is any positive admission of a fact by him, any omission on his part to explain what, indeed, can be explained without his explanation should not be pressed against him.”<sup>2</sup> In this case the accused was charged with having made two contradictory statements, as follows:—

First statement.—“Dhondi Ram lives separate from me. I have only given him the cloth-shop. There is no partition. All the ancestral lands are in my possession, and I manage them.”

Second statement.—“I am Dhondi Ram’s elder brother, we live separate. It is 13 or 14 years back our partition took place. Myself and Dhondi Ram divided in Shalla 1808 or 1809. Dhondi Ram was aged 12 or 13. Dhondi Ram manages his estate since partition. It is not true what is stated in my deposition in case No. 429 of 1895, that only the cloth-shop was given to Dhondi Ram; that the land in dispute has come to my share...that it is true what I have stated, that Dhondi Ram separated before 12 or 13 years and all division of the property was made.”

2049. The statements were held to be contradictory, but they were held not to constitute an offence under this section. In the first place it was observed, that in order to convict a person of perjury on the strength of contradictory statements, it is necessary that the effect of the whole of the deposition should be considered. For two statements may appear to be in themselves irreconcilable, but their explanation may be found in the rest of the deposition. So in the case last cited, the witness had stated:—

“I became divided from Dhondi Ram, there was no document made with respect to partition. Dhondi Ram lives separately from me. I have only given him a clothshop. No divisions have been made—I myself am in possession of all ancestral lands and manage them.”

2050. These statements were held to explain themselves. What the witness had really intended to state was that there had not been allotments of shares, though the brothers had lived apart. “When he states in his second deposition that what he stated in his first was not true, he must be taken to have substantially meant that his denial of the relation of separated co-parcenary between him and his brother was not true. That.....bears on the question whether they were divided or not in point of law. It is a matter of opinion and as such cannot be made the basis of a conviction for perjury.”<sup>3</sup>

2051. Where the accused was charged with perjury in that he made a statement on the first occasion that he saw one L, son of R, run away from the custody of the peon and on the second occasion that he saw one man going eastward, and that he was not certain whether that man was the accused, it was held that the accused could not be charged or convicted for perjury as, at the time of his second deposition, the accused was not asked to explain his first deposition in the light of his second statement.<sup>4</sup> In another case the accused deposed before a Magistrate that he had seen P and others gambling in a certain place. On the 1st February he was cross-examined in the same case before the same Magistrate, and he then deposed that he did not know P and had never seen him gambling. He was convicted of having made two contradictory statements, and the question raised by Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., was whether a contradiction occurring in the same deposition could legally form the basis of a conviction for perjury. On the difference arising between him and Moore, J., the question was referred to Benson, J., who held with Moore, J., that there is nothing in law to prevent a legal conviction from being bad on contradictory statements made in the course of the same deposition.<sup>5</sup>

affords no ground for a conviction for perjury.<sup>1</sup> But the question cannot be disposed of as an abstract question of law, as it was by Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., though there is a good deal in what he observed about giving a witness a locus pœnitentiæ in correcting himself. But the question depends upon whether the contradiction was a correction or a deliberate departure from a former statement. If it was a mere correction or an explanation, the statement though false could not be regarded as made "intentionally." That word controls the whole section and, as has been remarked before, every statement, though contradictory, is not necessarily false within the meaning of the section. If a false statement does not bear directly on a material issue in the case, being relative to incidental or trivial matters only, it may be regarded as made inadvertently or by mistake, and not advisedly knowing it to be a false, and with the intention of deceiving the Court and of leading it to be supposed that which he stated is true.<sup>2</sup>

2053. In England, a conviction on the sole basis of contradictory statements is illegal,<sup>3</sup> but in India the legality of such conviction has now become established.<sup>4</sup> But the evidence required in such cases is the same as is requisite to establish any other case of perjury. As Markby, J., remarked in a case: "Of all criminal charges which can be made, perhaps the charge of perjury is that which the ends of justice require to be the most carefully and accurately worded. The more general is the allegation of falsehood, the less is the risk in putting it forward, and the greater the difficulty of rebutting it. It is, therefore, the right of the person accused of perjury to leave the statement which he is charged with having falsely made, distinctly and separately pointed to him, and I will venture to say that no Court can safely and satisfactorily arrive at a judicial conclusion relative to a charge of perjury, unless its investigation be directed singly to each alleged false statement, with the view to ascertaining, first, whether it was made at all; secondly, whether, if made, it was true or untrue; and thirdly, whether, if untrue, its untruth was present to the mind of the person making it at the time he made it."<sup>5</sup>

2054. So Parker, C. J., observed in an English case: "There is this difference between a prosecution for perjury and a bare contest about property that in the latter case the matter stands indifferent, and therefore a credible and probable witness shall turn the scale in favour of either party; but, in the former, the presumption is one to be made in favour of innocence, and the oath of the party will have a regard paid to it until disproved. Therefore, to convict a man for perjury, a probable or credible witness is not enough, it must be clear and strong testimony."<sup>6</sup> But this dictum does not support the rule enunciated by Norman, J., "that no man can be convicted of giving false evidence, except on proof of facts which, if accepted as true, show not merely that it is incredible, but that it is impossible that the statements of the party accused made on oath can be true; if the inference from the facts proved falls short of this, it seems to us that there is nothing on which a conviction can stand; because assuming all that is proved to be true, it is still possible that no crime was committed."<sup>7</sup>

defined, but it must mean the proceeding of a Judge exercising jurisdiction in the matter. Where, therefore, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate having called upon the complainant to show cause why he should not be prosecuted under s. 211, directed the Honorary Magistrate to record in a preliminary inquiry purported to be held on his behalf under s. 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it was held that the Honorary Magistrate had no jurisdiction to hold such inquiry and that a witness for the complainant who gave false evidence before him, could not be ordered to be prosecuted for this offence.<sup>1</sup> So a judicial proceeding must strictly comply with the requirements of law. Where, therefore, a statement of a witness taken by a Civil Court was not read over to him as required by Ord. XVIII, r. 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure the deponent could not be convicted of giving false evidence under this section.<sup>2</sup> But the mere absence of a certificate that the deposition had been read over to the deponent does not render the deposition inadmissible since the Court is bound to presume that the Judge had complied with the law.<sup>3</sup>

2057. Non-Judicial Proceeding.—Clause 2 deals with perjury in a non-judicial proceeding; e.g., a statement made to a Registrar under s. 68 of the Registration Act.<sup>9</sup>

witness without the deposition is inadmissible in evidence,<sup>1</sup> so that one without the other is insufficient to prove a case of perjury. The deposition should be put in, because it is a record made and required by law to be made, of the statement of the accused.<sup>2</sup> The proceedings in the case in which it was taken, ought also to be put in to show the nature of the proceedings in which the evidence was given.<sup>3</sup>

2059. But these records do not prove themselves. They have to be proved by those who made them, or those in whose presence they were made. This evidence must be directed to showing that the accused is the person who gave the evidence, that it was given in a judicial proceeding on or about a certain day, and that he gave it on oath or affirmation.<sup>4</sup> The deposition if reduced to writing must have been taken in accordance with law. That is to say, it must comply with the requirements of the law under which it was taken. If, for instance, it was taken under the Code of Civil Procedure, it must comply with the provisions of that Code relating to the reading over and signing of it by the Judge,<sup>5</sup> in the absence of which there can be no prosecution for perjury. For such evidence being required by law to be in writing no evidence other than the document itself is admissible in evidence, and the defects of the evidence cannot be permitted to be made good by parol. Where, for instance the witness was examined in Assamese, and the Judge recorded it in English, but it was neither signed by the Judge nor certified by him as having been interpreted to the witness, it was held that the defects were incurable and could not be made good by any other evidence.<sup>6</sup>

2060. Of course, a deposition taken under the Code of Criminal Procedure has similarly to be read over to the witness in the presence of the accused or his pleader, and it must then be certified as having been so read over, and must, of course, be signed by the Magistrate.<sup>7</sup> It is not necessary that the Magistrate must himself read the deposition over to the witness. All that is necessary is it must be read over to him by or before the Magistrate and to his hearing.<sup>8</sup> So where a deposition taken in a criminal case was read over to the accused, but not in the presence of the accused or his pleader, it was held to be a deposition not taken in accordance with law and as such it is not admissible under s. 80 of the Indian Evidence Act<sup>9</sup> and since s. 91 of that Act excludes parol evidence in such cases, it follows that no case of false evidence can be made out on such deposition.<sup>10</sup>

2062. Fabricating False Evidence.—Besides giving false evidence, a person may be dealt with under this section for fabricating false evidence, a term which has been defined in the last section. Such evidence may consist of an act done in Court, though the accused may not be on oath, or even open his mouth. Where, for instance, one Debi was charged with enticing away a married woman, and on the case being called on, both he and his brother Cheda Lal, the accused, applied to the Magistrate to call upon the prosecution witnesses to identify him. The Magistrate permitted this to be done, and thereupon Cheda Lal, brought up ten or twelve men and said that Debi was amongst them. All the witnesses including the woman said to have been enticed away, failed to identify Debi from amongst them, and thereupon the Magistrate asked Cheda Lal where Debi was, and he pointed to a man as being Debi, who being questioned said that he was Debi. It was discovered that the man was wearing a false moustache and that he was not Debi but Cheman. Cheda Lal was thereupon prosecuted for fabricating false evidence, and it was held that he had committed the offence inasmuch as the three circumstances necessary to constitute the offence were present. In the first place the accused had caused a circumstance to exist, namely, the placing of Cheman as Debi. In the second place he had intended that such circumstance might appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding, for he had intended that Cheman should personate Debi, and lastly that circumstance would have naturally materially affected the judgment of the Court, for, it would have disbelieved the witnesses implicating Debi, since their identification of the accused was evidence of an important character bearing materially on the result of the trial.<sup>1</sup>

2064. Where, however, the accused appeared before a Marriage Registrar, representing himself to be the bridegroom, while his confederate appeared to prove that the marriage had been duly solemnized, thereupon the Registrar made an entry of the registration of the marriage, which was false, whereupon the two confederates were prosecuted under this section for fabricating false evidence, and the question was whether their act amounted to that offence. It was held that that act did not come under the first and second clause, nor did it amount to the giving of false evidence before a public servant. The question then was whether it amounted to the fabricating of false evidence within the meaning of section 192. But it was held that of the three ingredients required to constitute that offence evidence of the intention to use the false entry in any judicial or other proceeding was wanting, and the accused were consequently acquitted, it being held that it may well be that the false entry was made to be useful in cases other than those specified in s. 192, for it may be to prevent the marriage of the girl with any other person, or it may be that the entry was made for any other purpose. But the fact that it was not shown to have been made with any of the purposes specified in section 192 entitled them to be acquitted of a charge under this section.<sup>1</sup>

2066. Measure of Punishment for Perjury.—The punishment for perjury must necessarily vary with the gravity of the offence, which depends upon the circumstances under which the false statement was made. Evidently a servant perjuring himself in the interest of his employer, will have to be judged by a very different standard to one who was entrapped into inconsistent statements by the ingenuity of the cross-examining counsel, or who from ignorance, recklessness or want of proper understanding had made statements which were self-contradictory. A deliberate mis-statement made in a Court of Justice, whether it tends to endanger the life and property of others, or to defeat and impede the progress of justice, it is not an offence of the same complexion as a mis-statement made with no ulterior object from which no inference can be drawn.<sup>4</sup>

if innocent person be thereby convicted and executed.

2068. Analogous Law.—This section was amended by the substitution of the words "the law of British India or England" for "by this Code or the law of England."<sup>6</sup> The words "or the law of England" were added in 1890 by the Indian Railways Act, section 149.<sup>7</sup>

(6) Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XXVII of 1870) s. 7.

(7) Act IX of 1890.

2070. Whipping.—A person is, on a second conviction both under this as well as the last section, liable to the sentence of whipping in addition to the punishment here prescribed.<sup>1</sup>

2071. Proof.—The points requiring proof are those mentioned under the last section, in addition to which the following further points must be proved :—

That the accused when giving or fabricating false evidence, intended thereby to cause or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause the person in question to be convicted of the capital offence, under the Indian Penal Code, or under the English Law.

For the second clause, prove further :—

- (1) that the capital punishment was carried into effect; and
- (2) that the person executed was an innocent person.

2072. Principle.—This is an aggravated form of the same offence as is made punishable under the last section—the aggravation consisting in the perjury involving the risk of life. It is, therefore, divided into two parts according to the peril it has caused. If the perjury was aimed only at procuring conviction of a person of capital crime, the maximum sentence prescribed is transportation but if it has led to the execution of an innocent person, then the perjurer is himself liable to the sentence of death. In either case, the offence need not be necessarily committed “in any stage of a judicial proceeding,” and in this respect the terms of this section are wider than those of the last section—the difference being due to the gravity of the offence, which may lead to the sacrifice of human life. The offence would then be complete even if the evidence be given before a police-officer investigating into a case, of the nature described in the section.<sup>2</sup>

2073. But this view is not consistent with that maintained in Bombay where it has been held that this section only applies to false or fabricated evidence given in the final stage, for example the trial, and not merely in the preliminary inquiry into the case. Where, therefore, an accused had in a preliminary inquiry before a Magistrate, given a deposition in which he had falsely stated that he had seen the person charged before the Magistrate in the act of committing murder, it was held that the offence committed could not be punished under this section. This view proceeds upon the words “intending or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause any person to be convicted” of a capital crime. “Ordinarily” it was observed “only his deposition before the Court of Sessions could have this effect, and the usual presumption of his intending the natural consequences of his act, would fix him only with an intent to get the accused committed for trial. True the Sessions Judge might refer to the depositions in the preliminary inquiry, but this would be exceptional, and cannot be supposed to have been contemplated by the prisoner.

that the murderer was another person by name Dava, and not Mohan Lall. There was, however, other evidence implicating the latter, and he was convicted, and the accused was thereupon prosecuted under this section, inasmuch as, by his statement before the Court of Sessions, he had implicated Dava who was innocent of it. But the Court held that the offence of the accused fell under section 193, because in implicating Dava, his object was to save Mohan Lall, and not to cause the conviction of Dava. In fact in giving that deposition in the trial of Mohan Lall, he could not possibly cause the conviction of Dava of murder. He could not, therefore, know that he would cause, or was likely to cause the conviction of Dava for murder.<sup>1</sup> Of course, his evidence had the effect of throwing suspicion on an innocent person of the murder, and it may have been that his deposition may have led to his prosecution for that offence. But this was neither his primary intention, nor was it likely in that proceeding and in consequence of his statement. The section was therefore rightly held to be inapplicable.

2075. Of course, it is not necessary that some specified person should be the target of such perjurer. If his intention was to implicate "any" person, his offence may be complete, though it fails to implicate a certain person. But in order to sustain a conviction under this section, the false evidence must be such that, if believed, it would result in a conviction for a capital offence.<sup>2</sup> It is only then that the accused can be said to know the likelihood of a conviction for a capital offence. If his evidence is not direct, but circumstantial, it may then be a question whether he could be said to possess that knowledge which is a gist of the crime. So where in a case the accused Naurang deposed that he had heard a sound of something like a brick or stone falling into a well, and that he subsequently saw a dead body in the well, and noticed Bihari and another person running away, and Bihari was acquitted, it was held that the deposition of Naurang made out only a case of concealing evidence of murder, and did not by itself, or coupled with other evidence make out Bihari to be the murderer. He could not therefore be charged under this section.<sup>3</sup> This case suggests another. Suppose two persons A and B conspire to see C an innocent person convicted of murder. A and B divide the points necessary for C's conviction, but the evidence of one without the other is insufficient for the purpose. There are the statements of A and B but no evidence of conspiracy against them; could both of them be convicted under this section? If there is evidence of conspiracy, the question presents no difficulties. But in the absence of conspiracy the evidence taken singly would be insufficient for a conviction. In that case neither A nor B could be convicted under this section.

2076. Section When Inapplicable.—This section is inapplicable to a person accusing another of murder to a police officer in an inquiry under s. 174 of the Code, the reason being that it is difficult to affirm the existence of an intention to cause, or of knowledge that the false evidence is likely to cause a person to be convicted of a capital offence, when the proceeding in which the evidence is given is one in which such a conviction is not legally possible.<sup>4</sup>

2080. In addition to the punishment here provided, the accused may on a second conviction be sentenced to whipping by way of additional punishment.<sup>5</sup>

2081. Proof.—The points requiring proof are the same as for an offence under s. 193, in addition to which the following fact must be established:—

That the accused, when giving or fabricating false evidence, intended thereby to cause, or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause any person to be convicted of an offence not capital, but punishable with transportation for life, or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards.

2083. The requirements of this section are otherwise the same. There must be the giving or fabricating of false evidence. It must be with the intention or knowledge that the person accused will be thereby convicted of an offence, the punishment prescribed for which is transportation for life or imprisonment for at least seven years. Besides the facts necessary to prove an offence under s. 193, these three ingredients must be clearly established. That is to say, there must be clear evidence of intention or knowledge that the evidence was given to procure a false conviction of a person for an offence of that gravity. The evidence of knowledge must be unequivocal, though it may not be direct. But it must be nevertheless evidence sufficient to justify a finding that the evidence was given or fabricated with only that, and no other, intention. So where, in a case, one Sheo Charan went to the accused's house to remonstrate with him for having beaten his nephew, and thereupon the accused assaulted him, and immediately set fire to a thatch in front of his house with the object of getting Sheo Charan convicted of arson, the Court held that the accused could not be convicted under this section, as he had set fire to it in a public manner, and took no steps to implicate Sheo Charan. In other words, the act was at best merely preparatory to the commission of an offence under this section, though it was by itself sufficient to constitute mischief punishable under s. 436.<sup>1</sup> But suppose, that in such a case, the accused had, after setting fire to the thatch, charged Sheo Charan with arson, would the offence under this section have then been complete?

2084. Such a question presented itself before Hobhouse and Loch, JJ., in a Calcutta case in which the accused had not only set fire to his own house, but also immediately afterwards charged the accused falsely of burning it, on which Hobhouse, J., remarked: "The firing of his house by prisoner was simply, it seems to me, a minor act on his part subordinate to the major act of making the false charge, for the fact of the burnt house was manifestly intended to be used as evidence of the said charge."<sup>2</sup> But this appears to be no reason for taking the case out of the section, and if it were a reason, it would apply equally to the case supposed in the illustration. Indeed, such a case is scarcely distinguishable from that where the accused secreted some stolen railway pins in the field of his enemy, so that the latter might be apprehended and charged with their theft, and who was thereupon held to have committed an offence under this section.<sup>3</sup> Such was held to be the case of the accused who enclosed in an insured cover worthless paper and produced its receipt in proof of discharge of a debt.<sup>4</sup>

2085. Indeed, it is to provide adequate punishment for acts such as these, that the scope of the section was enlarged by the Railways Act,<sup>5</sup> so that a person fabricating evidence so as to procure another's conviction for an offence under s. 126 of that Act<sup>6</sup> would, since the amendment, be equally liable to a conviction under this section, for the offence is one which is by that section, punishable with transportation for life, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years.

196. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use as true or genuine evidence any evidence which he knows to be false or fabricated, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave or fabricated false evidence.

Using evidence known to be false.

2086. Analogous Law.—Evidence which is false or fabricated must conform to the definition of those terms as given in sections 191 and 192. The giver of such evidence is punishable under the provisions of ss. 193-195. Its suborner is punishable under this section. Such a person is in fact the abettor of the principal offence, but it may not be always possible to establish the elements of abetment. Moreover, law regards such an abettor as much guilty as the principal offender, and this section therefore makes him liable to an equal punishment. In so far as the provisions of this section relate to fabricated evidence, they may be compared with those of section 471, which presents common elements, and in such cases a person may be convicted on either count, though not on both.<sup>7</sup>

2088. As remarked before, so far as this offence relates to fabricated evidence, its provisions are similar to those of s. 471. But the fact that an offence under that section is not invariably triable by the same Court as an offence under this section, may create a difficulty. For if a Magistrate convicts under this section, the accused may justifiably plead defect of jurisdiction, on the ground that his offence was one under s. 471 and triable exclusively by the Court of Session. To obviate such a difficulty, cases arising out of the filing of forged documents should be invariably committed to the Court of Session on a charge both under this as well as under section 471. According to the Calcutta High Court in such cases, a conviction by a Magistrate under this section would be illegal.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) That the accused used or attempted to use some evidence.
- (2) Which was false or fabricated.
- (3) That he used or attempted to use such evidence as true or genuine evidence.
- (4) Though he then knew it to be false or fabricated evidence.
- (5) That he used or attempted to use it corruptly.

2090. Charge.—This section prescribes a punishment for two distinct and separate offences namely, for “using” and “attempting to use” false evidence. They should be, therefore, separately charged, and where the facts only warrant a charge of one or the other, the charge should then use only words appropriate to it. In case of doubt, the charge may be framed in the alternative.<sup>2</sup> In any case the charge should specify whether the evidence used or attempted to be used was false or fabricated. It may be worded thus :—

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—corruptly used (or attempted to use) as true or genuine evidence, the evidence, to wit—which you knew to be false (or fabricated) and as such punishable under s. 193 (or 194, or 195 of the Indian Penal Code), and thereby committed an offence under s. 196 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or High Court).

2091. Principle.—Persons who give false evidence are naturally exposed to the penalties provided in the three preceding sections. Those who procure or suborn such evidence may be guilty as abettors or under the provisions of this section. If their abetment was merely confined to instigation, they would then be only liable under the general law of abetment. But if they have attempted to use or in fact used such evidence, their offence is scarcely distinguishable from the offence of those who actually gave that evidence. But a person may call a witness who may give false evidence, but it does not render the party calling him liable under this section. His liability depends upon using such evidence “corruptly”—a word which the Code does not define, but which is here probably used to denote an impropriety brought about by bribery or undue influence resulting in acts which are inconsistent with the proper discharge of official duty or the rights of others. It implies impropriety but not necessarily venality.<sup>3</sup> An act may be ‘corrupt’ if it is wicked or immoral, though it may not be technically dishonest or fraudulent. A person who desires to procure a false conviction does so corruptly, though his intention may be merely improper.<sup>4</sup> In this sense not only the party who procures or tenders false evidence, but also the judge who improperly uses it for the purpose of determining any question he is called upon to decide, commit an offence under this section. The word “use” is therefore not confined merely to procurers and suborners of such evidence. It may equally apply to the judge, who makes use of false evidence which he knows to be false. In this view the section presents a wider outlook than at first sight it seems to do.

2092. Meaning of Words.—“Corruptly uses or attempts to use”: For the meaning of “corruptly” see the last paragraph. The word implies no more than a general felonious intent.<sup>1</sup> No use or attempted use of a thing is punishable unless it amounts to “evidence” not necessarily admissible evidence<sup>2</sup>, but at least such as is prima facie admissible. Consequently, a mere attempt to obtain a medical certificate which was refused could not be punished under this section, because there was merely an attempt to procure evidence, and no attempt to use it.<sup>3</sup> “As true or genuine evidence”: the word “true” has been used in contradistinction to “false”, and “genuine” in contradistinction to “fabricated” evidence. “Any evidence which he knows to be false or fabricated”: That is to say, the evidence must in fact be false or fabricated, and it must have been known to be so by the accused. “Punished in the same manner”: That is, to the same extent. The penalty for the offence is the same as for giving false or fabricated evidence, but the offence committed is not the same.

Indeed, the word "corruptly" in this section has not a wholly different meaning to what is implied by the expressions "fraudulently" or "dishonestly" as used in s. 471.

2095. Again, the accused must have used the evidence "corruptly," that is to say, from a dishonest or improper motive (§ 2091). An innocent use of false evidence is not then within the category of the crime. The object of these penal provisions is no doubt to safeguard the Court against the perversion of their proceedings by the introduction of false and fabricated evidence. But at the same time law cannot visit with its penalty, persons who do not know that the evidence they are offering is false and who, moreover, do not offer it corruptly. The fact that the evidence tendered was false does not necessarily imply that it was known to be so by the accused, nor does the fact that it was known to be so, necessarily imply that it was used corruptly.<sup>1</sup> The question of materiality may thus become relevant, though not for its own sake, but as tending to throw light on the question of knowledge and intention. So where a person was shown to have produced as evidence an account book in support of his claim and it appeared that one page of it has been fraudulently abstracted and another substituted for it, it was held that though the account book had been tampered with, still it did not necessarily follow that the accused was necessarily guilty. The question was, how far the account book was material as a piece of evidence, for on its materiality depended the question whether the accused was likely to have used it corruptly. It was found that, having regard to the dates of the transactions entered next to the page abstracted, the missing page could not possibly have contained an entry of the disputed transaction. It could not then be presumed that the accused had used the book corruptly, when the only forgery which had taken place, had no relation whatever to the purpose for which the false evidence was used.<sup>2</sup>

2096. The evidence of knowledge is then essential to constitute the crime. But such evidence need not be direct. Indeed, direct evidence may not be always procurable. It may consist of such fact or circumstances as may lead the Court to believe that the accused's mind was possessed of the information that the evidence given was false or fabricated. Mere belief, however reasonable, is not enough. There must be knowledge. That knowledge need not, however, go beyond the fact that the evidence was false or fabricated. A document need not have been fabricated for the purpose for which it was used. For it is enough if it was fabricated, when and for what purpose it is immaterial. So where the accused sued on a bond and at the trial sought to support his claim by a letter of acknowledgment forged six years previously for the purpose of securing registration of the bond, it was held that the filing of the letter in the bond-suit constituted its corrupt user so as to bring the offence of the accused within the visitation of this section.<sup>3</sup> Of course, there can be no user, certainly not corrupt where a person produces a document because he is ordered to do so.<sup>4</sup>

2097. The case of false evidence presents no difficulty. But the case of fabricated evidence raises another question. Must it have been fabricated in British India? And if so, what should be the consequence, if the place of its fabrication be unknown? According to West, J., the word "fabricated" as used in this section, must mean fabricated so as to constitute an offence. Consequently, evidence fabricated out of British India is not fabricated in the sense of this section, and a person who uses such evidence, however corruptly, is not liable under this or any other section of the Code.<sup>5</sup> He then pointed out the dangerous consequences of this view, adding "In ordinary cases he would be liable to transportation for using such fabricated evidence to procure a capital conviction, but if the evidence has been fabricated on the other side of the frontier, he goes scot-free."<sup>6</sup>

197. Whoever issues or signs any certificate required by law to be given or signed, or relating to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence, knowing or believing that such certificate is false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Issuing or signing false certificate.

2098. Analogous Law.—Several Acts of the Legislature provide for the granting of certificates to persons who are then thereby invested with certain rights or empowered to do certain things, by virtue of the authority so conferred upon or declared to be in them. The certificates are in the nature of letters patent and their authenticity and correctness is presumed and must be above reproach. This section punishes those who issue or sign them knowing or believing them to be false on any material point.

2099. Procedure and Practice.—This section requires no complaint of a public servant as a necessary preliminary to prosecution. The offence is non-cognizable, and warrant must issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first class.

- (1) That the document in question is a certificate.
- (2) That it was required by law to be given or signed, or that it related to some fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence.
- (3) That the certificate is false.
- (4) That it is false in a material point.
- (5) That the accused issued or signed it.
- (6) That at the time he issued or signed it, he knew it to be false.

2101. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you—, on or about the—day of—at—being required by law, to wit—to issue (or sign) a certificate, issued (or signed) the same and of which is by law admissible in evidence of the fact to wit—knowing (or believing) that such certificate is false in any material point, to wit—, and thereby committed an offence under s. 197 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or High Court).

2102. Principle.—This section penalizes only the wilful falsification of such certificates as are either required to be signed or given by law, or are such as afford prima facie evidence of the fact to which they relate. There are a number of Acts under which public servants are empowered to issue such certificates. They carry with them their own evidence of authenticity and correctness the value of which depends upon the care and circumspection used in preparing them. Those responsible are, therefore, justly visited with the penal consequences here prescribed, if they sign or issue a certificate false on a material point, which might be the means of causing injury to those acting upon it.

2103. Meaning of Words.—“ Issues or signs ” : The word issue merely means delivery, issuing being the act of sending out or causing to go forth. “ Issued ” then simply means the act of giving or delivery, and the section itself interchangeably uses the two words “ issue ” and “ give .” It may be issued to a definite person or an indefinite body of men, such as the public. “ Signs ” means signing in token of authentication. A clerk initialling a certificate on the strength of which the responsible official signs it may be liable as an issuer, but he does not sign within the meaning of this section. “ Any certificate ” : A certificate is a testimony given in writing to declare or verify the truth of anything. It is a formal document and does not include a petition or other document in which a fact is stated or certified.<sup>1</sup>

2104. Criminal Liability for False Certificate.—In order to make a person criminally liable for a false certificate two things are essential : (i) The certificate given must be such as is required by law to be given or signed or it must be by law admissible in evidence,<sup>1</sup> and (ii) it must be false in any material point. A certificate of character or the like is thus excluded from the category of the crime. It only safeguards those certificates which are required by law to be given, and which are then declaratory of a certain right or status, and which thus serve the same purpose as decrees of Courts. Such a certificate may be given by the Administrator-General,<sup>2</sup> entitling the claimant to the estate of a deceased person, to recover any sum belonging to him up to the extent of Rs. 1,000 and any debtor paying any sum and obtaining a copy of the certificate with a receipt for the sum annexed shall then be fully discharged.<sup>3</sup> A similar certificate may be given by a Court under the Succession Certificate Act,<sup>4</sup> which has the effect of indemnifying all persons making payments on its strength.<sup>5</sup> So the Registrar of Companies is empowered to issue a certificate of incorporation which shall be conclusive evidence that all the requirements contained in respect of registration under the Indian Companies Act have been complied with, and that the company is authorized to be registered under that Act as a limited or unlimited company as the case may be; and the date of incorporation mentioned in such certificate shall be deemed to be the date on which the company is incorporated under that Act.<sup>6</sup>

2105. Pleaders and Mukhtears admitted to practice, receive a certificate signed by an officer appointed by the High Court, which authorizes them to practise up to the end of the year for which it is given,<sup>7</sup> after which it may be renewed. So the Registrar of Assurances is, on completion of registration of an assurance, empowered to endorse thereon a certificate containing the word "registered." "Such certificate shall be signed, sealed, and dated by the registering officer, and shall then be admissible for the purpose of proving that the document has been duly registered in manner provided by the Registration Act, and that the facts mentioned in the endorsements referred to in section 59 (of the said Act) have occurred as therein mentioned."<sup>8</sup> A minister of religion acting under the Indian Christian Marriage Act,<sup>9</sup> is empowered to issue a certificate of notice given and declaration made under ss. 17 and 24, and the Marriage Registrar may issue a certificate under s. 41 of the same Act permitting the contracting of a contemplated marriage, and a person licensed to solemnize marriage is empowered to certify it, and "the certificate shall be signed by such licensed person, and shall be received, in any suit touching the validity of such marriage, as conclusive proof of its having been performed."<sup>10</sup> Custodians of public records have to furnish a copy of public documents on demand and payment of the legal fee therefor, and such copy must bear a certificate written at the foot of such copy that it is a true copy of such document or part thereof, as the case may be, and such certificate is to be dated and subscribed by such officer with his name and official title and it must be sealed whenever such officer is authorized by law to make use of a seal.<sup>11</sup> Such certified copy may be produced in proof of the contents of the public documents or parts of the public documents, of which they purport to be copies.<sup>12</sup>

2106. The Civil Courts have also to issue certificates under the various provisions of the Procedure Code. It may, for instance, have to certify a payment or adjustment of a decree made out of Court,<sup>13</sup> or grant a certificate of sale to an auction-purchaser,<sup>14</sup> or of a case being a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council.<sup>15</sup> In all such cases the certificate creates certain rights or declares a certain status, and it is legally admissible in evidence, and is, moreover, in some cases even conclusive proof of the matter therein stated. A person issuing or signing any such certificate would therefore be subjected to the penalty prescribed in s. 193. That section, however, prescribed penalties for giving false evidence either in a stage of judicial proceeding or in any other case. This section does not specify as to which of the two penalties an offender under this section will be subject; but inasmuch as a person issuing a false certificate cannot be treated as one tampering with judicial proceedings, the penalty prescribed here is, it is apprehended, imprisonment of either description extending to three years as well as fine.

2108. All official acts of public servants in the form of certificates are not ipso facto admissible in evidence, unless they are declared by law to be so admissible<sup>2</sup> or are otherwise admissible under the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act.<sup>3</sup> A false certificate not required by law to be given or signed, or which is not legally admissible in evidence cannot be made the basis of a conviction under this section, though the person issuing or signing it may be otherwise dealt with, as, for example, of giving false information to a public servant.<sup>4</sup> So where the notice of transfer of land was signed by a person who falsely personated his father, and the declaration appended thereto was signed by the accused who confirmed the false personation, it was held that as the declaration was not required by law, the accused could not be convicted under this section, though he might have been for giving false information to a public servant. But a copyist who had made an incorrect copy of a document by adding a name not to be found in the original, on the basis of which the persons to whom it was delivered maintained a suit was held to have committed an offence under this section.<sup>5</sup>

2109. Such a person was held not to have "framed or translated" a document within the meaning of s. 167 of the Code, but he was held to have issued or signed a false certificate within the meaning of this section. It is not necessary that the certificate should have been signed or issued by the person legally empowered to sign or issue it. It may have been issued by a person wholly unauthorized, and still he may commit the offence, for all that the section requires is that the certificate must be one either required by law to be issued or signed, or it must relate to a fact admissible in evidence. "Whoever" issues or signs such a certificate, brings himself within the penal visitation of this section, whatever may have been his authority, duty or power.

2110. Abetment.—A bailiff falsely stating to the Nazir that he had effected service of a summons upon a person, which in fact he knew he had not, and whereupon the Nazir certifies due service would be guilty of abetment of an offence under this section, though the Nazir may be wholly innocent.<sup>6</sup> But if the bailiff did not know that the person he was serving was the person to be served, he could not be convicted of abetment, for knowledge or belief in falsehood is the cardinal ingredient of the crime.

2111. Lastly, the certificate must be false on a material point. The question what point was material must depend upon the nature and object of the certificate. For instance, a wrong date may be material in one case and wholly immaterial in another. So even the names of the parties may be immaterial having regard to the object for which the certificate is granted. A person knowingly falsifying a certificate will probably falsify it on a material point. On the other hand, inaccuracy on an immaterial point does not detract from its value,<sup>1</sup> and cannot be presumed to have been due otherwise than to inadvertence.

198. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use any such certificate
 Using as true a certificate known to be false. as a true certificate, knowing the same to be false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

2112. Analogous Law.—This section bears the same relation to the last as section 196 bears to sections 193, 194 and 195. The language of the two sections is closely analogous, and the commentary under that section is mutatis mutandis equally applicable to this section.

2113. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Sessions, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

- (1) That the document in question purports to be a certificate ;
- (2) That it was either required by law to be given or signed, or that it related to some fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence ;
- (3) That such certificate is false ;
- (4) And false on a material point ;
- (5) That it was signed or issued (not necessarily by the person legally authorized to sign or issue it) ;
- (6) That the accused used or attempted to use such false certificate ;
- (7) That he did so corruptly ;
- (8) That he then knew that it was false in a material point.

2115. Charge.—The charge should follow the form given under section 196.

199. Whoever, in any declaration made or subscribed by him, which False statement made in declaration which is by law receivable as evidence. declaration any Court of Justice, or any public servant or other person, is bound or authorized by law to receive as evidence of any fact, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is made or used, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

[Court of Justice—s. 20.      Public Servant—s. 21.]

2117. Certain Acts specially provide for the penalty attaching to false declarations made under them. So the Special Magistrates' Act, 1872, provides as follows :—

Penalty for signing declarations or certificate containing false statement.

“ Every person making, signing or attesting any declaration or certificate prescribed by this Act, containing a statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, shall be deemed guilty of the offence described in section 199 of the Indian Penal Code.”<sup>2</sup>

class. On a case failing under this section the Court refused to convict in revision under section 182 holding that to sustain a conviction under that section sanction was necessary and that section 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code did not condone an irregularity to that extent. It, however, left it open to the District Magistrate to initiate a case under section 182 if so advised.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) That the accused made or subscribed the declaration in question.
- (2) That such declaration was inadmissible in evidence of the fact therein stated.
- (3) That the accused made a statement in such declaration.
- (4) That the statement was false.
- (5) That such false statement was on a point material to the object of such declaration.
- (6) That the person making the declaration either knew or believed it to be false or did not believe it to be true.

2120. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“That you——, on or about the——day of——at——made (or subscribed) a declaration which a Court of Justice to wit——(or any public servant or other person) was bound (or authorized by law) to receive as evidence of a fact, and therein made a statement to wit ‘——’ which is false, and which you knew to be false (or did not believe to be true) on a point material to the object for which the declaration was made (or used) and thereby committed an offence under section 199 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court.)

2121. Principle.—There are certain facts upon which a person must make a declaration, there are others upon which he may do so. In the former case such a declaration falls within the terms of section 191, in the latter case the penal consequences attaching to such a voluntary declaration are also the same, provided that the declaration was admissible in evidence. In other words, whether a declaration be compulsory or voluntary, a person making it falsely is liable to conviction as for giving false evidence if it was a declaration either required to be made by law,<sup>2</sup> or was admissible in evidence. As the risk of mischief was in either case the same, the penalty provided by law is also identical.

2122. Meaning of Words.—“Declaration made or subscribed by him” : “Declaration” means any statement of fact made in the form simply of a declaration which, for the purpose of proof of the fact declared to, has by itself all the legal force of evidence given on oath or the solemn affirmation substituted for an oath. In short, such a declaration is receivable in lieu of personal testimony.<sup>3</sup> An affidavit, in a case in which evidence may be given by an affidavit, is a declaration within the meaning of this section.<sup>4</sup> A person who subscribes to a declaration certifies that the facts therein declared are correct. A verbal declaration may be “made,” while a written one must be subscribed by the person making it. “Bound or authorized by law receive as evidence” : In the one case, he must, in the other case he may, receive it in evidence. “Knows or believes to be false, etc.” : For the meaning of this phrase, see s. 191. “Touching any point material to the object” : This provision as to materiality shows that the section has no reference to the evidence of a witness in a judicial proceeding. In one sense, such evidence is a declaration, but then it is a declaration on oath or affirmation and, as such within the comprehension of section 191.

2123. False Declaration.—A false declaration made under the circumstances specified in the section exposes the declarant to the same penalty as if he had given false evidence. These circumstances are stated by the section to be (i) that it must be a declaration ; (ii) that it must be admissible in evidence ; (iii) that it must be false on a point material to its object; and (iv) that the declarant must have known or believed it to be false at the time he made it.

2124. In the first place it must be a declaration, that is to say a formal statement of facts in the form simply of a declaration which, for the purpose of the fact declared to, has by itself all the legal force of evidence given on oath or solemn affirmation. (i) It must be a Declaration. It must be a declaration which having been made, is afterwards receivable as evidence of the fact declared.<sup>1</sup> Examples of the declarations here contemplated are affidavits in civil suits, statutory certificates under sections 2 (8) and 4 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act<sup>2</sup> and declarations and certificates under the Special Marriage Act, 1872.<sup>3</sup> Any report required and made under any law cannot be treated as a declaration for the purpose of this section. For instance, a person entering upon possession of revenue paying land is under the several local Acts, required to make a report of that fact to a Revenue Officer, but such report is not a declaration, and if false, the reporter cannot be punished under this section.<sup>4</sup> Where a statement has to be sworn to before an officer duly authorized for that purpose, it must be sworn to before him, otherwise it is not a declaration.<sup>5</sup>

2125. A declaration may be oral or written. If the latter, it must be subscribed to by him. This means that he must affix his signature at the end of the writing in token of its correctness. A sworn oral statement, such as a deposition of a party or witness in a judicial proceeding, if false, may amount to perjury, but the provision as to its materiality shows that it was intended to be excluded from this section.<sup>6</sup>

2126. Then, again, there must be evidence that the declaration was made or subscribed to by the accused. If a false declaration be then made not by the accused, but by his pleader, the accused could not be punished under this section. Where therefore the accused who was defendant in a suit instituted against him for the enforcement of a bond denied the execution of the bond, and later on, his pleader filed a petition asking that the suit was compromised and might, as such, be struck off, it was held that not having signed the petition it could not be made the foundation of a charge or conviction under s. 199 though a deposition on oath supporting such petition would justify a charge under s. 193.<sup>7</sup>

2127. Secondly, the declaration must be (a) evidence and (b) at least admissible as such by law.<sup>8</sup> (ii) It must be Admissible. A false statement as to the amount due to the applicant in a petition for execution, though verified in accordance with law, is a declaration, but nevertheless it is not punishable under this section because it, of itself, is no evidence of the sum due,<sup>9</sup> though it is only a choice of evils, since such a case would unquestionably fall under section 193. So where the accused identified a person who falsely personated another, the husband, before the Mahomedan Registrar of Marriages, and obtained the registration of the husband's divorce from his wife, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section inasmuch as the Registrar was not bound or authorized by law to receive his statement in evidence, though he might be guilty of an offence under section 466 and section 114 if he knew that the man had personated another, or at least had no knowledge of his identity.<sup>10</sup> An application by the accused under section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, made to the High Court, for the transfer of a case, is a "criminal proceeding" within the meaning of section 5 of the Oaths Act, under which it is unlawful to administer an oath or affirmation to the accused. Therefore an affidavit sworn to by him before the Deputy Registrar of the High Court is a mere nullity and he cannot be convicted for any false statement therein.<sup>1</sup>

2128. Before a declaration can be made the subject of a prosecution under this section it must be shown to be a declaration which law treats as evidence—not merely as an admission against the declarant, but as evidence for and against him.<sup>2</sup>

2130. The fact that there is no prohibition against the receptibility of such evidence does not render it admissible. For the powers of the Court and public servants are defined and circumscribed by law, and before a declaration can be made the foundation of a prosecution for perjury under this section, there must be some law under which the declaration must be at least admissible in evidence. So where the accused applied to a Municipality for a hackney license for two carriages and six ponies, declaring that to be the number owned by him, though in fact he had been plying nine animals upon which he was prosecuted under this section, the Court held his liability under this section to depend upon the provisions of the Municipal Act. If that Act creates an obligation on an applicant for a license truly to declare the conveyances and animals in his possession then the offence would be one made punishable under s. 193. If, again, there be anything in that Act to make it admissible in evidence before the Municipal Commissioners, then the offence would be one made punishable by this section. In another case the accused had obtained from the Mamlatdar a certificate of his solvency, based upon a false declaration made before him. He used it for the purpose of securing a license from the Abkari officials. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of this offence for making a false declaration, since there was no law under which the Mamlatdar could have received it "as evidence" of the accused's solvency.<sup>6</sup>

2131. But as the Court remarked: "It needs a very slight acquaintance with the Indian Evidence Act, and with the principles of law which are embodied in it, to satisfy any one that the statement made by the accused for the purpose of taking out these licenses, is no evidence at all against any one but himself, and could only be evidence against himself as proving an admission by him, that at the time he made it he had in his possession six horses and no more, for which he was liable to pay the tax. It is obvious that it is impossible to strain the words of the section, so as to bring such a case within them, and we are clearly of opinion that on the facts alleged here, no charge can be framed against Chandi Pershad under section 199."<sup>7</sup> This case then clearly establishes that in order to render a declaration penal under this section, it must be something more than a mere admission in a party's own favour; if it is an admission it must be such as was admissible in evidence in the proceeding in which it was tendered. The same view was taken in another case in which the accused had made a false written declaration to a Mamlatdar in Bombay, with a view to obtain from him a certificate of his solvency to enable him more easily to obtain an excise contract for which he had tendered. When tried under this section he pleaded guilty, but the High Court acquitted him holding that his plea merely amounted to an admission of the fact and that as he had committed no offence in law he was entitled to an acquittal.<sup>8</sup> A false verification in a plaint or pleading of an application for execution, does not therefore fall within this section, though they are punishable under section 193, because a plaint, pleading or an application for execution is not admissible as "evidence of any fact" as required by this section.

2132. Thirdly, it must be false on a point material to its object. The question of materiality is a question of fact dependent upon the object of the declaration. It will be noticed that materiality is by no means directly essential to constitute the offence of perjury (§ 1944), though it is of the essence of the offence.

(iii) False on a Material Point.

2133. Lastly, knowledge of belief in its falsity is an essential here as it is in the case of false evidence, and the meaning of the qualifying phrase in the two sections is the same (§§ 1984-1988).

200. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use as true any such declaration, knowing it to be false, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Explanation.—A declaration which is inadmissible merely upon the ground of some informality, is a declaration within the meaning of sections 199 and 200.

2134. Analogous Law.—This section is again related to the last in the same wise as section 198 is to 197 or section 196 to sections 193, 194 and 195. The object is not only to punish the false declarant, but also one who corruptly uses or attempts to use it as true, though he then knew it to be false in any material point.

2135. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without previous complaint.<sup>1</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant must issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate, first class.

2136. Proof and Charge.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused used or attempted to use a declaration ;
- (2) That he did so corruptly ;
- (3) That he used the declaration as true ;
- (4) Though in fact it was a false declaration ;
- (5) And was false on a material point ;
- (6) And which fact the accused knew ;
- (7) That the declaration was one which a Court of Justice, or any public servant or other person was bound or authorized by law to receive as evidence, of any fact (s. 199).

For a form of charge, see ss. 196 and 198.

2137. Principle.—The policy underlying this section as well as s. 196 and 198, is the same. They make the users of false evidence, certificate or declaration equally liable with the makers thereof, if only they knew them at the time to be false on any material point. Law regards such persons as particeps criminis, and as such holds them liable.

For a further commentary on this section, see ss. 196 and 198.

201. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, causes any evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment or with that intention gives any information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false,

2138. Analogous Law.—This section belongs to the group of sections to which sections 118-120, 176, 177, 181, 182, and 201-203 belong. The first group of sections<sup>1</sup> deals with the concealment of design to commit an offence. The second deals with the omission to give information,<sup>2</sup> the third with giving false information,<sup>3</sup> and the fourth with the causing of disappearance of evidence,<sup>4</sup> which is made punishable by this section, but which though generally worded, does not extend to false information given by a witness in a judicial proceeding, and which is false evidence punishable under sections 193-195 of the Code.<sup>5</sup>

2140. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and if the offence screened is punishable with death it is triable exclusively by the Court of Sessions; if the offence screened is punishable with transportation or imprisonment for ten years, then either by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class; otherwise it may be tried by a Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first class, or the Court by which the offence screened is triable. In awarding the sentence regard must be had not to the offence actually committed but only to that the accused knew had been committed.<sup>7</sup>

(2) That he—

(a) caused any evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear, or

- (b) gave any information respecting the offence which he then knew or believed to be false;
- (3) That the accused then knew or had reason to believe that the offence had been committed;
- (4) That he did as in (3) with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment.<sup>1</sup>

To these may be added the following in proof of aggravation—

- (5) That the offence in question was punishable with death, or with transportation for life, or with imprisonment extending to ten years.

2142. Charge.—An accused charged under this section cannot be convicted under the next section (s. 202) inasmuch the ingredients of the two offences are not identical, nor are those of one implied in the other.<sup>2</sup> It is highly undesirable though not quite illegal<sup>3</sup> to charge the same person in the alternative, of murder and this offence,<sup>4</sup> or to convict him in the alternative.<sup>5</sup> In fact the two charges are inconsistent, and if the accused is found to have been principal, he could not be convicted of accession under this section. An accused charged both under this offence and that under s. 302 may be convicted of this offence by the High Court, though he is acquitted of murder and the Sessions Judge omitted to give any finding in respect of it.<sup>6</sup> A person who gives false information to the police, accusing another of murder, in order to screen the real offender, commits offences not only under ss. 201 and 203 but also under s. 211.<sup>7</sup>

“That you—, on or about the—day of—, at—knowing (or having reason to believe) that certain offence, to wit—punishable with—, have been committed, did cause certain evidence of the said offence to disappear, to wit—(or knowingly gave false information, to wit—) with the intention of screening the said (name of the offender screened) from legal punishment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 201 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session or High Court).

2144. Principle.—The section presents a case of accession after the fact. “An accessory after the fact” said Lord Hale “may be, where a person, knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon.”<sup>8</sup> Therefore, to make an accessory ex post facto, it is in the first place requisite that he should know of the felony committed.<sup>9</sup> In the next place, he must receive, relieve, comfort, or assist him. And, generally, any assistance whatever given to a felon to hinder his being apprehended, tried or suffering punishment, makes the assister an accessory.”<sup>10</sup> The offence of an accessory after the fact was never regarded so serious as that of other accessories, and as such an accessory might have been moved by feelings of love or pity to assist the felon, in which case his prosecution was seldom ordered, and it was always discouraged.<sup>11</sup> That policy has led to the elimination of that class of offenders from the Code; but there still remained persons whose offence could not be similarly overlooked. There are those who know of the felony committed<sup>12</sup> and that it is complete<sup>13</sup> and still assist the felon not only by relieving, comforting or assisting him; but also by weakening the prosecution against him. Such a case is made punishable by the section, the policy of which is to prevent such accessories from tampering with justice. Of course, the section has no application to the offender himself who cannot be prosecuted for obliterating the traces of his own crime.<sup>1</sup> Nor can he be tried for abetment.<sup>2</sup> It only applies to others who make his escape easy by putting the prosecution off the scent.

2145. Meaning of Words.—“Whoever knowing that an offence has been committed” i.e., the “whoever” must not be the offender himself. The section deals with an accessory after the fact. (§§ 2039, 2148). “Causes any evidence to disappear”: Such evidence may or may not be material to the proof of crime. Nor need it be legally admissible. The word “evidence” is here used in its primary sense as meaning anything that is likely to make the crime evident, such as the existence of a wounded corpse, or blood stains, or fabricated documents or similar material objects indicating that an offence has been committed.<sup>3</sup> The disappearance must have been caused, and not merely suffered. It must have been brought about by the active assistance of the offender, and its primary object must have been to screen offender from punishment. Mere knowledge that it will have that effect is insufficient.<sup>4</sup> Removing,<sup>5</sup> concealing or otherwise disposing of the body of a murdered person amounts to causing disappearance of evidence.<sup>6</sup> “With that intention gives any information”: To whom? Presumably to those interested in bringing up to justice.

2146. Screening an Offender.—The opening sentence of this section enacts “whoever knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed,” from which it would at first sight appear that the mere having reason to believe was sufficient to support a conviction, it being immaterial whether an offence was, or was not in fact committed. But this is obviously not its meaning. It postulates the commission of an offence and then proceeds to describe the elements of criminality. “For, it is impossible for any one to know, or to have reason or sufficient cause to believe that an offence has been committed when it has not been committed. A person may fancy that he knows or has reason to believe an offence to have been committed when it has not been committed, but he is mistaken in so fancying. He may, under the influence of such a mistake, remove something which he supposes to have been committed; and he may be morally blamable for so doing. But it is beyond the province of criminal legislation to punish a man for a delusion or even for an act which has not caused any actual harm to the public or any individual member of society.”<sup>7</sup>

2148. From what has been said elsewhere (§ 2039) it is manifest that the section only applies to persons other than the actual offenders.<sup>1</sup> A person who first commits an offence and then conceals evidence of it cannot be punished for both the offence as well as its criminal concealment,<sup>2</sup> nor, indeed, alone for the latter.<sup>3</sup> He may be suspected of one and convicted of the other, and in that case there would be other difficulties to overcome. But it would be wrong to minimize the offence of the culprit by prosecuting him under this section when the facts warrant his trial as a principal.<sup>4</sup> For the question then would be whether the statement made was self-exculpatory or made to screen another person an offender. And even when the latter is the case, the question may still be whether the statement was not made to inculcate another with the object of exculpating oneself. For it cannot be the object of the section to punish a person circuitously when he cannot be punished directly. Nor does the section penalize an offender for the absence of exalted morality in obliterating the traces of his crime with the object of insuring his escape from justice by diverting suspicion from himself and which he may do, either by concealing the corpus delicti or by falsely incriminating another.<sup>5</sup> In such a case, the accused may bring himself within the penal visitation of some other sections, but his is not the case to be dealt with under this section.

2149. On the other hand, there is nothing illegal in convicting a person under this section of criminal concealment, though he may have been tried and acquitted of the principal offence.<sup>6</sup> But in such a case it is neither safe nor proper, to convict him upon his own confession, made in the previous case, in which he may have made the statement inculcating another with the object of exculpating himself. And in such case the evidence must be clear to the effect that the accused had caused evidence to disappear in order to screen some other offender known or unknown, from legal punishment.<sup>7</sup> So, where two or more persons are accused of complicity in a crime, and some of them are acquitted, whilst others convicted, there is nothing against the former being tried under this section for screening the latter.<sup>8</sup> So where six persons including the two accused, had been tried for murder, and the evidence against the accused was that they had carried the dead body in their cart which was blood-stained, upon which they were acquitted of murder, it was held that upon that evidence, if believed, there was nothing to prevent their being convicted under this section.<sup>9</sup>

2150. The accused was tried under this section to cause the disappearance of evidence of a murder, to screen his sons whom he suspected of the crime. The sons were tried and acquitted of the charge. It was held that the ordinary consequences of the accused's act was that the offender, whoever he might be, would be screened and that if the accused contemplated this ordinary consequence, he would be answerable for this offence though he could not be held guilty of the offence of screening his sons.<sup>10</sup>

offence, as, if it be a justifiable homicide. Such was the case of a person who getting scent of a thief making an aperture in the wall of his house came out stick in hand, and on the thief advancing to attack him, the latter struck at him in the dark killing him on the spot. He then called out the two accused, who were his uncle and nephew, who lit a lamp and saw that the man had died. Thereupon they carried his corpse to a sugar-field, a mile distant, and left it there. This was evidently done to screen their relative from the charge of killing the thief, but, as it was justifiable, there was no offence committed, and as there was no offender, the accused could not then be convicted of screening him.<sup>1</sup>

2152. In another case, A went into B's field where he found C with whom he had an altercation, in the course of which he slapped him. C fell down, and the next day he was found lying dead near the spot where he had been hit by A on the previous day. A was prosecuted for culpable homicide and discharged for want of sufficient evidence. B was then prosecuted for having burnt C's corpse before the police could be communicated for having prevented the making of a report. But it was held that, as there was no offence or offender after A's discharge, B could not be charged for concealing evidence.<sup>2</sup> So where two persons were charged with murder and both were discharged on the ground that though the evidence pointed conclusively to one or the other being the actual murderer, there was no evidence to show which of them had committed the murder, it was held that neither of them could then be convicted for causing disappearance of some evidence in the case.<sup>3</sup>

2153. Assuming then that there was an offence committed, and that there is an offender awaiting justice,<sup>4</sup> the next thing required by the section to be proved is that the person to be charged under the section, must have known or have reason to believe that an offence has been committed. But of the offence he may not have much knowledge. He may believe a person to be guilty, but he may have no reason for his belief. In that case he does not transgress the provisions of this section by doing what is here condemned. The section only punishes him who either knew or had reason to believe that an offence had been committed. Now, no one can be said to have reason to believe a thing unless he had sufficient cause to believe that thing.<sup>5</sup> It lies on the prosecution to prove that the accused had such sufficient cause for his belief. This must depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. So where a person was by chance present at the commission of a murder, and being too frightened he did nothing to prevent it, and he was afterwards threatened into joining with the murderers in concealing the body, it was held that though the accused could not be convicted of abetment of murder still his offence fell under this section.<sup>6</sup> So persons accused of complicity in a murder may not be convicted of it, but there may be sufficient evidence against them to uphold a conviction under this section. So where the two accused were along with four others jointly tried for murder, but the only evidence against them was of having removed the corpse in their cart which was found to be blood-stained, it was held that though the accused might have been acquitted of murder, there was nothing against their being convicted of criminal concealment under this section.<sup>7</sup>

of the commission of which, the person accused had knowledge. If, therefore, what had disappeared was not evidence of the offence, the accused commits no offence, whatever may have been his act. So where A and B murdered C in their own field, and then removed the corpse to C's own field to divert suspicion from themselves, it was held that the accused could not be convicted for causing disappearance of evidence, first, because they had not done so to screen themselves from punishment, and secondly, because the removal of C's corpse to C's field had not the effect of causing any evidence, which that corpse afforded, to disappear.<sup>1</sup>

2155. So in another case, a son of the accused having murdered a child in a room of her house, the accused removed the blood-stained sheet from the child's body and placed it in a box which she locked up, as also her house, upon which she was incriminated under this section, but the Court held that the locking up of the sheet and the house did not amount to the disappearance of evidence, as "the presence of the sheet on the body did not constitute evidence that murder had been committed, it was in itself no evidence of the murder, and its concealment did not cause evidence of the murder to disappear. The same must be said of the locking of the door of the house. The body was in the house in an inner room, and was covered with cotton stalks. The act of locking up the door merely prevented access to the interior of the house, and did not amount to moving the body or concealing it from sight. The body remained where it lay, and could be seen by any one who obtained access to the house."<sup>2</sup>

2157. Intention to Screen the Offender Essential.—Again, even though the thing screened be evidence, the next requirement of the section is that the screening must have been with the intention of screening the offender. In other words, what the section requires is that it should be the primary and sole object of the accused. The fact that the concealment was merely likely to have that effect, is not sufficient, for, the section speaks of intention as distinct from a mere likelihood. Whenever the Code speaks of likelihood, the phraseology adopted is "intending or knowing it to be likely," but here what is stated is intention only, and it must therefore be proved by evidence which establishes something more than a mere likelihood.<sup>6</sup> So where the prisoners having discovered the body of a woman who had evidently been murdered, lying within the limits of their village, and who thereupon apparently with no other intention than to save themselves from the harassment and expense of a police-investigation removed the body to another village, which had the effect of putting the police off the scent for a time, it was held that, as the removal was not with the intention of screening the offender, the act of the accused did not fall within the section.<sup>1</sup> So where A killed a thief in the exercise of his right of private defence, and B and C helped him to remove the corpse to a field, a mile distant, the latter were held to have committed no offence as A's killing was a justifiable homicide, and there being, therefore, no offender, there could be no offence under this section.<sup>2</sup> (§§ 2146, 2150).

2160. No Offence.—The accused, a Head Constable, while investigating a complaint of theft, searched the house of a suspect, found there two clothes which the complainant identified as his own, and produced similar clothes to confirm his statement. The Head Constable recorded their statements; but afterwards suppressed these papers and fabricated other statements in which the complainant was stated to have withdrawn his complaint and produced the very clothes which he said had been stolen. A panchnama to this effect was also concocted. He was convicted both of this as well as of the offence punishable under s. 218; but his conviction of this offence was set aside, on the ground that the suppressed papers could not be construed to be evidence of the commission of theft though they were evidence relating to the inquiry of the Commission of the theft.<sup>4</sup> A person who acts under overpowering compulsion cannot be said to act with any intention to screen the offender.<sup>5</sup>

202. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence
 Intentional omission to give information of offence by person bound to inform. has been committed, intentionally omits to give any information respecting that offence which is legally bound to give, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

[Offence—s. 40, s. 203, Expl.

2161. Analogous Law.—The provisions of this section are analogous to those of s. 176 of the Code, which is, however, more general, for, while it relates to the legal obligation to furnish information on any subject, this section only relates to the commission of an offence. As it is, both the sections have but an application limited to the class of persons "legally bound" to give information. Such persons are, for example, the Police, village headman, village accountant, village watchman, village police officer, owner or occupier of land, and the agent of any such owner or occupier, and every officer employed in the collection of revenue or rent of land on the part of Government, or the Court of Wards.<sup>1</sup> The public are also under the legal obligation to inform the police, regarding the commission of certain offences specified in s. 44 of the Procedure Code. The subject has already been discussed in the preceding pages (§§ 1749-1752). The distinction between this section and the next should be noted. No one except those "legally bound" is liable for omitting to give any information. But if he gives information, whether he was or was not legally bound to give it, he is liable if he gives it knowing or having reason to believe it to be false.

2162. Procedure and Practice.—No sanction is required for a prosecution under this section. The offence is non-cognizable, and summons must issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and it is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

- (1) That the accused was "legally bound" to give the information in question ;
- (2) That it was information respecting the commission of an offence ;
- (3) That the accused knew or had reason to believe that such offence had been committed.
- (4) That he omitted to give information ;
- (5) Though he knew or had reason to believe that the offence about which he was legally bound to inform, had been committed ;
- (6) That such omission was intentional.

2164. Charge.—The charge if necessary should run thus :—

" I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) do hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

" That you—, knowing that on or about the—day of—at—the offence of—was committed (by—), intentionally omitted to give information respecting its commission, which you were legally bound to give, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 202 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

2165. Principle.—This section, like the last, postulates the commission of an offence, though it does not expressly say so. But it is, nevertheless, abundantly clear that no person can be said to know or have reason to believe that an offence has been committed, when nothing has been in fact committed (§§ 2146, 2150). The commission of an offence must be assumed. The section then makes an intentional omission to inform by those 'legally bound' to do so, criminal. This is in accordance with the modern notion of citizenship when many of the duties, at one time confined only to the police, have been delegated to other functionaries, and even in certain cases to the public. In such cases intentional omission to inform is criminal, but it is only so when the accused "knew or had reason to believe that an offence had been committed." This must be proved by the prosecution. The fact that a person had facility of obtaining a certain information, is no ground for holding that he knew or believed it. Nor is it his duty to enquire. He is not bound to be inquisitorial in order to perform his legal obligation. Nor does the law require it. If he knows or believes that an offence has been committed, then he must communicate ; otherwise he is under no obligation.

2166. Criminal Omission to Inform.—As observed before (§ 2161) the liability of a person for omitting to give information is limited by his legal obligation to give it. If he was not legally bound to furnish it, he cannot be held liable for intentional omission under this section. Even if he was so liable, the section does not visit his mere omission with penal consequences. For it only punishes those who knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, intentionally omit to give the information. In order to make a person liable, it is therefore in the first place necessary to establish the corpus delicti.<sup>1</sup> If it is not established, there can then be no conviction for intentional omission to give information, respecting an offence which is not proved to have been committed.

2167. Then again, as this section only applies to the commission of an offence, a person is not bound to inform about its apprehension. So where a police patel was charged with omission to report the arrival at his village of dacoits, and with having supplied them with food and drink, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section as there was nothing to show that an offence had been committed by the persons who visited the accused's village.<sup>2</sup> In such a case the accused might, however, have been convicted under s. 176 on mere proof of intentional omission, but which was wanting. Indeed, intentional omission cannot be inferred from a mere omission to report. It must be not only an omission, but a wilful omission, that is to say, an omission which amounts to suppression due to some ulterior object. So where the police-patel ordered the Kulkarni to write a report, regarding a suspicious death in his village, but which was neither written nor sent, the omission was held to be intentional, in view of the fact noticed by the Court "that when a murder has occurred the patel has gone in pursuit of the offender, or has recorded evidence, or has held the inquest, and where his good faith is thus apparent, it would not be proper to convict him under s. 202 of the Indian Penal Code of an intention to evade the law about the first report."<sup>3</sup> Proof of intention as well as omission is therefore essential.<sup>4</sup> As Kemp, J., remarked: "There may be knowledge or a reason to believe that an offence has been committed; there may be an omission to give information; but it is clear, at least, to me that the gist of the offence is intention."<sup>5</sup>

203. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, gives any information respecting that offence which he knows or believes to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Giving false information respecting an offence committed.

Explanation.—In sections 201 and 202 and in this section the word "offence" includes any act committed at any place out of British India, which, if committed in British India, would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459, and 460.

[Reason to believe—s. 26.

Offence—s. 40, and see Expl.]

2169. Analogous Law.—The explanation to this section was added by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1894.<sup>7</sup>

2170. The language of this section is, again, too wide. If literally construed, it would render a person giving false replies to questions put to him by the Police, in the course of their investigation, punishable; but it is obviously not its meaning. The "information" given here must have been volunteered and not vouchsafed to question put either by the Police,<sup>8</sup> or, indeed, by the Magistrate; otherwise the accused setting up a false plea, would render himself liable to suffer the penalties of this section. The offence is designed to punish one who by volunteering misleading information, puts the investigating officer off the track of the real offender; and in this sense this offence may be regarded as yet another instance of an accession after the fact.

2171. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but non-compoundable, and is triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of first or second class. A person once acquitted of this offence, cannot be retried for an offence under section 177, as the two offences possess the same essential ingredients.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) The commission of an offence;<sup>2</sup>
- (2) That the accused knew or had reason to believe that it had been committed
- (3) That he gave the information;
- (4) That it was with respect to that offence,
- (5) And that it was false,
- (6) Which the accused then knew or had reason to believe that it was false.

2173. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, &c.) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows :—

“That you—knowing that on or about the—day of—at—the offence of—was committed by—gave information respecting the said offence, to wit—which you knew or had reason to believe at the time to be false, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 203 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

2174. Principle.—This section only prohibits the communication of misleading information, by persons who may or may not be under a legal obligation to supply any information. It only requires that if persons do give information, whether because they must or because they choose to, it must not be wilfully false, for the giving of false information may mislead those who are to avail themselves of it, and if it is given knowingly or with reason to believe in its falsity, then the deception practised becomes wilful and therefore criminal. It is not necessary to prove an intention to screen the offender for that may not be the intention, and yet the object may be criminal. Here again, the first thing assumed is the commission of an offence. The giving of false information respecting the commission of a crime never committed, may be punishable elsewhere,<sup>3</sup> but it is not punishable under this section. As Jackson, J., observed: “The object of the legislature was not to insure general veracity or the making of correct statements in regard to supposed offences, or to offences the commission of which might be falsely or incorrectly reported, but to discourage and punish the giving of false information to the police, in regard to offences which had been actually committed, and which the person charged knew, or had reason to believe, had been actually committed.”<sup>4</sup>

2175. Liability for False Information.—The general scope of this section has been already discussed (§ 2174). It punishes the wilful communication of false news, whether the communication be voluntary or in pursuance of a legal obligation referred to in the last section. It does not punish the falsehood, but only its dissemination after knowledge or belief in its falsehood. The question of motive or intention is immaterial, and it is therefore neither required to be proved by the prosecution, nor is it a complete answer to a charge. It may, however, show that the informer did not possess the knowledge or belief in its falsity, and that he believed in the information he had imparted. But where the evidence of knowledge is clear and cogent, there is then no room for mistaken belief. For example, where the accused chowkidar was shown to have seen the body of a murdered person with wounds in the throat and jaw which indicated foul play, from a distance of 10 or 12 feet, his report that the man had died of cholera, was held to be unaccountably false, and such as was sufficient to justify a conviction under this section.<sup>1</sup>

2176. The explanation is new and only applies to more serious crime. Its object is to prevent falsification of reports, not only with respect of crimes committed within British India, but also serious crimes committed outside. Reasons have already been given why the policy of the criminal jurisprudence in all countries, has of late been to regard a criminal not merely as a concern of the State, but as an enemy of mankind. This is, of course, only true of persons who commit those offences which are regarded as such, in the penal laws of all countries, and which are here enumerated.

204. Whoever secretes or destroys any document which he may be lawfully compelled to produce as evidence in a Court of Justice, or in any proceeding lawfully held before a public servant, as such, or obliterates or renders illegible the whole or any part of such document with the intention of preventing the same from being produced or used as evidence before such Court or public servant as aforesaid, or after he shall have been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Public servant—s. 21.

Document—s. 40.]

2177. Analogous Law.—This offence is only an aggravated form of the offence made punishable by section 175, with which it must be compared. The section applies equally to civil as well as criminal proceedings, and it lays down a penalty which is independent of that to which a recalcitrant person may be otherwise liable.

2178. Procedure and Practice.—The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency or first class Magistrate.

- (1) That the accused secreted, or destroyed, or obliterated or rendered illegible the whole or any part of a document;
- (2) That the document was such as he may be lawfully compelled to produce as evidence in a Court of Justice, or in any proceeding lawfully held before a public servant;
- (3) That in doing so<sup>2</sup> his intention was to prevent the document from being produced or used as evidence, or he did so after he had been lawfully summoned or required to produce the document to be used as evidence.

2180. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

"That you—secreted (or destroyed or obliterated or rendered illegible) the whole (or any part) of a document to wit—which you may be lawfully compelled to produce as evidence in a Court of Justice (or in any proceeding lawfully held before a public servant) to wit—with the intention of preventing the same from being produced (or used as evidence) before such Court (or public servant) (or after you had been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for being produced or used as evidence) and thereby committed an offence under s. 204 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

(3) Gangaram, 14 Bom. L. R. 1163, 17 I. C. 1008.

2183. Destruction of Documentary Evidence.—The gravamen of the offence lies in the intention of the offender,<sup>1</sup> to withdraw from the Court a document which it has the right to see. The power of the Court to obtain production of documents is by no means unlimited or unqualified; and before a person can be held accountable for contumacious non-production of a document, the prosecution must show that the Court had lawfully summoned or required him to produce the document and that he was equally lawfully bound to produce it. The mere fact that it is lawful of the Court to call for the document, does not make one lawfully liable to produce it, for he may be merely its custodian and may then justly refuse to produce it without consulting its owner.<sup>2</sup> Moreover, a mere refusal to produce a document is neither secreting nor destroying it. A person may be guilty of contempt if he refuses to produce a document, but he cannot be dealt with under this section unless all its terms are strictly complied with.

2185. The fact that the document was withdrawn after it had been produced in Court, would not exonerate one from the penalty, if he had afterwards secreted or destroyed or obliterated it. So in a case the plaintiff's suit for recovery of money due on a bond was by consent of the parties, referred to arbitration. The parties were at issue as to the exact amount repaid on the bond. The plaintiff admitted Rs. 516 as so repaid, whereas the defendant claimed credit for Rs. 540. One of the witnesses before the arbitrator stated that the sum repaid was Rs. 540 and that it was so endorsed on the bond, and the defendant then requested the arbitrator to show the endorsement to the witness to refresh his memory. The accused strenuously objected to the bond being shown to the witness and on the arbitrator deciding to show it to him, he seized the document and ran out of the house with it, and subsequently refused to produce it. It was held that in doing so, the immediate object of the accused was, that considering himself aggrieved by the adverse decision, he determined to prevent effect being given to it, and with that intention removed the document, to be subsequently refused to produce it. The loss or gain was held to be present in the mind of the accused and operating to influence his conduct. But, nevertheless, he was held to be guilty of an offence under this section, but not of theft, and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 50.<sup>5</sup>

2186. Intention Material.—Though the section does not speak of the disappearance being caused with any intention, it is clear that, without a criminal intention, there can be no crime. Consequently, where in the course of an investigation, a police officer had a certain documents drawn up and signed by a Panch but finding it disfigured by scratches and interlineations, he had it recopied by the same writer and the same Panch, the first copy being then destroyed, it was held that the act explained itself and that there being no mens rea, there was no crime.<sup>1</sup>

205. Whoever falsely personates another, and in such assumed character makes any admission or statement, or confesses judgment, or causes any process to be issued or becomes bail or security, or does any other act in any suit or criminal prosecution, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

False personation for purpose of act for proceeding in suit or prosecution.

2187. Analogous Law.—There are five sections in the Code dealing with the offence of false personation.<sup>2</sup> False personation of a soldier is made punishable by s. 140, of a public servant, by ss. 170, 171, of a juror or assessor by s. 229, and of a party, witness or surety by this section. The section raises the question whether there can be false personation of a fictitious person. It will have to be considered later on (§§ 2193-2195).

2188. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section, without previous complaint as required by s. 195 of the Procedure Code. The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session or Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of first class.

- (1) That the accused falsely personated another;
- (2) That he made any admission, statement or confession, or caused any process to be issued or became bail or security, or did any other act;
- (3) That he did as in (2)<sup>3</sup> in his assumed character as is in (1);<sup>4</sup>
- (4) That such admission, etc., was made in any suit or criminal prosecution.

2190. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

"That you—, on or about the—day of—at—falsely personated—(name of the person personated) in—(specify the suit or prosecution) and in such assumed character, you made an admission, to wit—(or a statement or confession, or caused any process to be issued, or became bail or security or did any other act) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 205 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."<sup>5</sup>

2192. Meaning of Words.—"Whoever falsely personates another," for the meaning of which see the last paragraph (§ 2191). "And in such assumed character": that is, there must not only be false personation, but some specific act done in that character. "In any suit or criminal prosecution": suit is defined to be a proceeding which terminates in a decree. It is, properly speaking, a proceeding, regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure, or such as by the operation of the particular Acts which regulate them, is treated as a suit. "Or does any other act": Should such act be ejusdem generis? It would seem so, for, otherwise, the section would not specify all the important acts the doing of which it condemns.

2193. False Personation in Suit or Prosecution.—An offence under this section is committed if a person (i) "falsely personates" another, and (ii) in that assumed character (iii) performs any act in a suit or criminal prosecution. In the first place, what is falsely personating another, and this question raises another, should that "another" be a real person? No, according to the view taken in an old case of the Calcutta High Court.<sup>1</sup> But this view has been combated in Madras where the mere assumption of fictitious name was held to be insufficient. "It must also appear" the Court remarked, "that the assumed name was used as a means of falsely representing some other individual. It is not an uncommon thing for men to pass under names not their own for the purpose of disguise, in some instances from blameless, and in other instances, from indifferent or bad motives—"in cog," as the disguise is often termed in the former, and "with or under an alias," in the latter instances. But, whatever the motive, the use of an assumed name without more, is not a criminal offence. It only becomes a crime when connected by proof with some other act or piece of conduct; and the gist of the offence of false personation under section 205, we think, is the feigning to be another known person. The whole language of the section clearly imports the acting the part of another person, the act of pretending that he is that person."<sup>2</sup>

2194. So it was agreed by the Judges in an English Case, that in all forgeries, the instrument supposed to be forged must be a false instrument in itself, and that if a person give a note entirely as his own, his subscribing it by a fictitious name will not make it a forgery, the credit ther being wholly given to himself, without any regard to the name, or any relation to a third person.<sup>3</sup> This case was cited with approval by Cockburn, C. J., in a case in which the prisoner, Robert Martin, had issued a cheque to the prosecutor, in the name of William Martin, upon a Bank, at which he had ceased to have an account. It was dishonoured on the ground that the signature was not that of any customer of the Bank. The prisoner was indicted for forgery, and Cockburn, C. J., reserved the case for opinion of the Judges, whether the drawing of a cheque under a false christian name amounted to forgery, and the Court was of opinion that it was not.<sup>4</sup> In this case, it must be noted, the prisoner was found to have no fraudulent or dishonest motive in signing the cheque in the manner he did. If such motive had existed, then probably the result would have been very different. That the person personated must be real, necessarily arises out of what Law regards as false personation. For, though the section does not refer to criminal intention, it is obvious that a mere false representation in fact, without that intention, would scarcely fall into the category of the crime. Where, for instance, a person presents a petition in the name of his father or uncle by whom he is authorized to present it, and on being questioned, he gives the name of the person whom he represents, it cannot be doubted but that there is false personation, but it cannot be said that the person innocently believing himself to be the alter ego of his parent, brings himself within the penalties of this section.<sup>5</sup>

and B representing himself to be A made a report of their theft, and deposed in Court in the name of A. B's object throughout was to spare A the trouble of making the complaints in person. It was held that B's act constituted an offence under this section, though his act was in no way fraudulent.<sup>1</sup> But this is probably an extreme case, and it is in conflict with the view taken in Calcutta.<sup>2</sup> This conflict was noticed in a Bombay case in which the accused had been requested by another to obtain a return of a document in his name, which he had left with the Registrar, and the question was whether he had brought himself within the terms of s. 82 (a) of the Indian Registration Act, which penalizes the intentional making of a false statement.<sup>3</sup> It was held agreeing with the Madras High Court that fraudulent gain or benefit of the offender was not an essential element of the offence described in this section, and the accused was indicted under the Registration Act, and sentenced to a nominal fine.<sup>4</sup> It was, however, conceded that the word personation by itself means false personation.

2197. Suit or Criminal Prosecution.—Again, the false personation must be in any suit or criminal prosecution, and not merely in any suit or proceeding. The word "suit" implies a proceeding of a civil nature, so that the whole phrase refers to a judicial proceeding, whether civil or criminal (§ 2192). And the term "criminal prosecution" would include not only a prosecution under the Code, but also one under any special or local law. So a prosecution under the Bombay Spirituous Liquors Act<sup>9</sup> was held to be a criminal prosecution.<sup>10</sup>

2198. Analogous Law.—This and next few sections ending with s. 210, borrow their principle from the Bankrupt and Insolvent Laws,—the fraudulent alienation and concealment of property being regarded as much a crime against public justice as the escape of an offender from custody, in order to avoid execution of a sentence of imprisonment, or the offence of harbouring or assisting such an escaped offender.<sup>1</sup> Sections 421-424 contain similar provisions against fraudulent transfer, in fact, their provisions are so similar that it may be well doubted if what little is distinguishable in them might not have been incorporated here, striking the later sections altogether out of the Code.

2199. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted for an offence under this section without special complaint.<sup>2</sup> But though this is a sine qua non, still where such an offence was taken cognizance of by a Magistrate without sanction, but there was nothing in the proceeding to show that the want of such sanction had in fact occasioned a failure of justice, it was held that the conviction was not bad only on that account.<sup>3</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That the accused removed, concealed or transferred or delivered his property to another;
- (2) That he did so intending thereby to prevent it from being taken by his creditor or the Court as stated in the section;
- (3) That his intention was thus to defraud;
- (4) That the property so removed, etc., had become liable, or was likely to become liable to be taken as a forfeiture, or in satisfaction of a fine, or in execution of a decree or order of a Civil Court;
- (5) That the seizure made or considered likely was by a competent authority.

2201. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you——fraudulently removed (or concealed, or transferred, or delivered to——) your property——(specify it) intending thereby prevent it from being taken as a forfeiture (or in satisfaction of a fine) under the sentence which had been pronounced (or which he knew to be likely to be pronounced) by——(mention the Court of Justice or other authority) in criminal case No.——(or intending thereby to prevent its being taken in execution of the decree which had been made by the Court in Civil Suit No.——), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 206 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

2202. Principle.—The principle underlying this and the following sections is to punish a person for fraudulently withdrawing his property, so as to defeat the just claims of those who have, or may shortly have a right upon it. As the Law Commissioners observe : “ If it is an offence against justice in a culprit to escape from custody, in order to avoid execution of a sentence of imprisonment, and an offence to harbour or imprison him and that such offences are fit subjects of punishment, we think upon the same grounds that the removal or concealment of property, or any dealing with it in order to prevent the execution of a sentence of fine, for example instead, of imprisonment, is an offence against justice and a fit subject of punishment.”<sup>4</sup>

(2) 2nd Rep., s. 162.

(4) 2nd Rep., s. 162.

2203. These sections are in principle salutary, but they have practically remained a dead letter owing to the difficulties they have presented in their application. And, indeed, the decisions of the Civil Courts now present a conflict which it will be difficult to reconcile with the section (§§ 2205-2209).

2204. Meaning of Words.—“Whoever fraudulently removes any property”: The words “any property,” taken with the word “whoever” do not restrict the removal merely to the owner. The word “fraudulently” has been defined in s. 25. It is to be distinguished from “dishonestly” defined in s. 24. “Removes, conceals, transfers or delivers”: Removal implies withdrawal so that it is no longer available to the creditor. It does not mean merely its carriage from one place to another. “Conceals”: Concealment may be by transfer or removal. “Transfers”: The word has been used here as defined in s. 5 of the Transfer of Property Act. “Delivers”: The word “again” implies either a transfer or concealment. Delivery to a person in trust to be returned when required, would be concealment, if it is made against an attachment. “Intending thereby to prevent..... in a civil suit”: which he knows to be likely to be made in a civil suit, i.e. a pending suit and not in a possible future suit,<sup>1</sup> “Decree or order to be made by a Court”: It excludes an attachment by a Revenue Court, probably because the claim so made is otherwise secured.

2205. Fraudulent Withdrawal of Property.—The fraudulent transfer of property is declared to be void by s. 53 of the Transfer of Property Act.<sup>2</sup> It is further made penal by the provisions of this section, the requirements of which are (i) that there should be a withdrawal; (ii) that it must be with a certain fraudulent intention; and (iii) it must be directed against certain claims. The question of withdrawal presents comparatively no difficulties. Any removal, concealment or transfer whether for or without consideration, would be within the rule, if its dominant object was to defeat the claims of those specified in the section. Indeed, sometimes the best index of the intention is the transfer itself. If it was ill-considered or hurried, or made without sufficient consideration, or on the eve of bankruptcy, or of a threatened suit or attachment, it would be undoubtedly, regarded as fraudulent within the general acceptance of that term.

2207. There is, however, such a thing as fraudulent preference in insolvency, which renders a transaction void against certain persons thereby prejudiced.<sup>1</sup> In such a case, the fraudulent transferor certainly brings himself within the ambit of this section. Indeed, it is clear from the language here employed that the transfers the section was intended to penalize, are not different from those prohibited under the two Elizabethan Statutes<sup>2</sup> since codified as s. 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. Under the provisions of that section, as under this section, the validity of the transfer depends upon the "intent to defraud." If that was the dominant motive of the transfer, then law reprobates the transfer as fraudulent, whatever may have been the consideration paid. On the other hand, if the transfer was not dominated by that intention, it cannot be impeached though it may be without any consideration. But there is this difference between a transfer with, and one without, consideration that, while the one is presumed to be bona fide, the other is presumed to be fraudulent. In the one case then it is for the person impeaching it to shew that though supported by consideration it was fraudulent. In the other case it stands self-condemned, and it is for those upholding it to show that, in spite of the absence of consideration, it was not made to defraud.

2208. Benami Transfer.—Apart from fraudulent intention, there is nothing against a person transferring his property nominally in favour of another person. Indeed, as remarked by the Privy Council, the practice of benami transactions is inveterate in India.<sup>3</sup> But as observed in a Calcutta case, "while it is impossible to ignore the existence of benami transactions in Bengal, we have no doubt that they must be judged by the ordinary and well-established rules of law, and that a third party cannot be made to suffer by the voluntary acts of owners of property. It is not to be supposed that because the existence of benami transactions has been recognized by our Courts, parties are at liberty to use the system to the injury of others, whether by direct fraud or by putting other parties in a position to defraud or take undue advantage of innocent persons."<sup>4</sup> But, while there is nothing per se fraudulent in a benami transaction, still it is a system that easily lends itself to fraud, and the fact that certain property is held benami, enables the beneficiary at any time to disclaim his ownership, while it is not an easy task for a stranger to assail it successfully. One test, though by no means the only test of whether a transaction is benami or otherwise, is to ascertain from whose funds the purchase money proceeds: but this fact alone does not create anything more than a strong presumption which may be rebutted.<sup>5</sup> Where property is held benami, the question of fraudulent intent may be a matter of inference, but such inference may fall short of the degree of proof required to establish an offence under this section.

2209. Proof of Fraud.—The question whether a particular transaction is or is not fraudulent, is a question of fact depending upon the circumstances of each case. At the same time, there are certain circumstances which are regarded as the badges of fraud. These were all considered in a leading English case,<sup>6</sup> which has been examined at considerable length by the present writer in his other work on the Law of Transfer to which reference must be made for an exhaustive presentation of the law on the subject. The commentary here is necessarily summary and by no means exhaustive. The questions that require consideration, in considering the fraudulent character of a transaction, are: (i) Why was the transfer made; (ii) was it a transfer of the entire estate; (iii) if it required change of possession, was possession transferred; (iv) how and when was the consideration paid, and (v) for what purpose was it appropriated; (vi) what publicity attended the sale; (vii) was the transfer antedated, (viii) and was it subject to trust in favour of the transferor; (ix) was it made on the eve of bankruptcy or on the eve of a threatened suit, attachment or execution.<sup>1</sup> These considerations may be sufficient to determine, whether a transfer is bona fide or fraudulent. But, as has been before observed (§§ 2207-2208), all transfers held fraudulent do not necessarily expose the transferor to the penalties of this section. For it does not condemn all such transfers, but only those as are intended to withdraw the property from being made available to satisfy the sentence of forfeiture or fine, or the execution of a Civil Court. Consequently, transfers made to defeat other creditors, are not within the grasp of the rule.

2210. Eliminating then from consideration such transfers, and confining the present discussion only to those intended to defeat a sentence or execution, two questions arise. Was the transferor actuated by the fear of sentence or execution, or was it made to defeat them. The fear of a sentence or execution could only arise when there was a reasonable chance of its being passed or taken out. This must depend upon what proceedings were impending or likely to take place, and how did the disposal of the property impair the chance of recovery. If the funds withdrawn still left enough to be available for the purpose, the question of fraudulent disposition would scarcely arise. For the funds available would be a sufficient reply to any charge of fraudulent transfer. The question could only arise when the transferor has, after his transfer, nothing to meet his existing or probable liabilities. So the assignment by the decree-holder, of a decree obtained upon the basis of a debt under attachment, does not per se amount to the commission of this offence, inasmuch as such assignment cannot affect the rights of the attaching creditor.<sup>2</sup> But it would be otherwise where, in pursuance of the assignment, money is paid over and which cannot be recovered. So the cutting and carrying off crops which the accused knew to be under attachment in execution of a certificate under the Public Demands Recovery Act,<sup>3</sup> was held to be an offence under this section.<sup>4</sup> The section is not confined merely to transfers, but extends to removal, concealment and deliver. In this respect, the section has a wider scope than the Elizabethan Statutes to which reference has been made before.

2211. But whatever may be the nature of the withdrawal, the object in each case must be the same, namely to prevent its being taken in execution. So where two tents were distrained and made over to the accused for safe custody, and on their being requisitioned he produced two other tents of inferior value and concealed or removed those distrained, it was held that in order to constitute an offence under this section, the removal must be to prevent the property "from being taken"; but as in this case the property had already been taken in distraint and the removal was subsequent, the accused could not be convicted under this section, though, if the facts were proved, the accused would be guilty of criminal breach of trust.<sup>5</sup> In this case the distraint was made under the orders of the local Revenue authority for the recovery of an arrear of land revenue, and it raised the question whether the distraint of property by a Collector under s. 153 of the N. W. P. Land Revenue Act<sup>6</sup> for non-payment of rent, constituted a forfeiture under a sentence pronounced or likely to be pronounced within the meaning of this section.

2212. That the levy of rent under a coercive process of law, cannot be regarded as the sentence of fine or forfeiture admits of no doubt; but whether it could not be regarded as money due under a decree, was not considered by the Court in the Allahabad case, but it was so held in a Calcutta case decided under the analogous provisions of the Public Demands Recovery Act,<sup>1</sup> section 8 of which, however, expressly provides that “every certificate made under s. 7 shall, as regards the remedies for enforcing it, and so far only have the force and effect of a decree of a Civil Court.” This act then expressly declares the orders of the Revenue Court, passed for recovery of land revenue, the status of the decree of Civil Court and, as such, they would naturally be treated as such decrees for the purposes of this section. Of course, Revenue officers may pass decrees which will have the effect of decrees passed by a Court of Justice. So a Collector trying a case under Act X of 1857 is a Judge, and a suit for rent is a civil suit, so that if a person fraudulently remove property intending thereby to prevent that property from being taken in execution of his decree or order, he would commit an offence under this section.<sup>2</sup>

2213. No Offence.—The essence of the offence is fraud. There is no fraud in a person removing his property to avoid its being mistaken with another property legally liable for seizure.<sup>3</sup>

207. Whoever fraudulently accepts, receives or claims any property or any interest therein, knowing that he has no right or rightful claim to such property or interest, or practises any deception touching any right to any property or any interest therein, intending thereby to prevent that property or interest therein from being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine, under a sentence which has been pronounced or which he knows to be likely to be pronounced by a Court of Justice or other competent authority, or from being taken in execution of a decree or order which has been made, or which he knows to be likely to be made by a Court of Justice in a civil suit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

2214. Analogous Law.—This section follows the example of those in which the accomplice receiver is equally punished with the principal offender.

2215. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without special complaint.<sup>4</sup> It is not cognizable, but warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and it is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

2216. Proof.—The points requiring proof are.—

- (1) That the accused fraudulently accepted, received or claimed any property or any interest therein, or practised any deception touching any right to any property;
- (2) That he then knew that he had no right or rightful claim to it;
- (3) That he intended thereby to prevent that property or interest therein from being taken in forfeiture, fine or execution;
- (4) That he then knew that such forfeiture, fine or execution was pending or was likely to be pronounced;
- (5) That the forfeiture, fine or execution was of a Court of Justice or of a competent authority.

2217. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“That you——fraudulently accepted (or received or claimed) any property, to wit——(or any interest therein, to wit——) knowing that you had no right or rightful claim to it [or (you practised any deception, to wit——) touching any right to any property or any interest therein] intending thereby to prevent that property (or interest therein) from being taken as a forfeiture (or in satisfaction of a fine) under a sentence which has been pronounced (or which you knew to be likely to be pronounced by the Court of——— (or by a competent authority to wit———) (or from being taken in execution of a decree or order which had been made on———(or which you knew to be likely to be made by a Court of Justice to wit———) in Civil Suit No.———of———], and thereby committed an offence under s. 207 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

2218. Principle.—The last section punishes the principal offender, this section reaches his accomplice. In pursuance of the view of law that crime increases with facilities afforded to its commission, the Code rigorously punishes accomplices, aiders and abettors equally with the principal offender. And so, in this very chapter, there are sections in which accomplices of perjurers have been held equally liable to punishment with those who are guilty of the principal crime.<sup>1</sup>

2219. Fraudulent Claim.—This section is supplementary to the last, but it is by no means its counterpart. It deals with a fraudulent receiver, a fraudulent claimant, as well as one who practises any deception touching any right to any property or any interest therein. A fraudulent receiver must naturally be the particeps criminis of the offender of the last section and so would ordinarily be a fraudulent claimant. For, no one is likely to bolster up a false claim unless he is supported therein by the very person to whom the property really belongs, and who is therefore in a position to show up his fraud without difficulty. Similarly, a person cannot safely venture upon the practice of any deception touching any right to any property or any interest therein, without the co-operation and connivance of one who is to be benefited thereby. These three modes of fraud would amply cover any attempt made to enlist the assistance of a confederate, and the latter would certainly be brought within the pale of the rule, if his improper interference has thwarted an order for execution.

2220. This section, of course, does not penalize an innocent transferee of property impregnated with the fraud of the transferor. Indeed, such a transferee for valuable consideration cannot be defeated by any creditor. It is only when the transferee participates in, or is aware of the fraud, that he is defeated in favour of other creditors. Consequently, a fraudulent transferor may be prosecuted and punished for his act under the last section, and still the transfer may be good and valid against the claim which the offender had intended to defeat, only if the transfer was for a valuable consideration and without notice. In such a case, the fraudulent purpose of the transferor would be achieved, though he may himself have to suffer for it. On the other hand, if the transferee or receiver of such property was aware of the fraudulent purpose, not only are they both criminally liable, but the property transferred would then be available to meet the claim which it was their common purpose to frustrate.

2221. But in this respect the rule enunciated in s. 53 of the Transfer of Property Act<sup>2</sup> is wider than that enunciated in this section, under which in order to render a transferee punishable, the transfer must not only be fraudulent, but it must be also fictitious. On the other hand, the section speaks of a claim or the practice of any deception which may or may not relate to the transfer of property. Even if it does, it carries the principle of fraud much farther than is to be found in s. 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. But, though the section is largely worded still it would not cover a case of every deception, however slight, intending, however remotely, to prevent the property from being seized in execution.

Whoever—s. 206.]

2222. Analogous Law.—This section is again one of those in which the object aimed at is to prevent the employment of the machinery of Court for fraudulent purposes. The Law Commissioners remarked that the section was drafted to prevent an abuse then said to be prevalent of getting some one to file a collusive suit for recovery of the whole property and suffering a decree to be passed. “No one at the time, is either injured or annoyed. It is only in the course of years, when unsuccessful in his speculations, and at the time his creditors press their claims against him, that the original plaintiff, the man of straw, appears, not with a naked claim, but with a decree in his favour, adjudging him with the whole of the defendant’s property. This property, he will acknowledge, he has nevertheless left the whole time in the defendant’s possession; but he pleads his right under a decree of Court.”<sup>1</sup> To put down this and similar abuse of the Court of Justice, this and the next sections punish both the plaintiff as well as the defendant to such a suit. The authors regarded this as an example of false pleading,<sup>2</sup> which encourages the giving of false evidence, and the sections have, therefore, been placed in the chapter relating to that crime. The sections do not make it criminal to sue without probable cause, the consequence of which would have been to expose every unsuccessful civil suit to the risk of a criminal prosecution. The section originally confined the penalties to a decree taken or suffered “fraudulently, or for the purpose of annoyance,” but the words “for the purpose of annoyance” were afterwards struck out.

2223. In enacting the rule, the sections make no innovation for provisions against the institution of frivolous, vexatious or groundless suits existing in the prior Regulations,<sup>3</sup> under which the Court in which such a suit was found to have been instituted, was empowered to fine the plaintiff and to commit him to close custody till he paid the fine.<sup>4</sup> The rule here enacted is of course, much narrower, for it only penalizes “fraudulent” suits, and the procedure prescribed is neither summary nor available to the Court trying them.

2224. It may be added that the rule was originally intended to be confined only to a fraudulent plaintiff, but it was added that the defendant instigator of the fictitious suit would be amenable under the law of abetment.<sup>5</sup> This view was, however, subsequently modified and the two sections now deal independently with the two parties.

2225. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without the previous complaint of the Court in which the fraudulent suit was instituted.<sup>6</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first class.

(2) That he did so for a sum not due, or for a larger sum than due, or in the case of execution, for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied.

(3) That in so doing the accused acted fraudulently.

2227. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“That you—on or about the—day of—at—fraudulently caused (or suffered) a decree (or order) to wit—in suit No.—of the Court of—to be passed against you, and which was for a sum not due [ (or for a larger sum than is due to such person or for any property or interest in property to which the decree-holder was not entitled) ] [or fraudulently caused (or suffered) a decree (or order) to wit—decree No.—in suit No.—decided by the Court—on—to be executed against you after it has been satisfied (or for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied) ] and thereby committed an offence under s. 208 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

“And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said charge.”

2228. Principle.—Though the primary object of such a suit was to prevent the making of a fictitious claim, for the purpose of securing the property of the defendant, by anticipation, against future creditors, that is against persons to whom he may in course of business become indebted, still, as the section is worded, proof of this intention is by no means necessary, though proof of fraud may involve proof of such or a similar intention. Of course, a person who suffers a decree without owing anything to the decree-holder must have one of two objects in view. It must be either to strengthen his hands against his creditors, or to help the decree-holder in a similar design. In any case, the object inevitably must be to use the decree in defrauding some one. It is not necessary that the fraudulent purpose should be immediately accomplished. Indeed, in the fraudulent practice in vogue in Tanjore and instanced by the Law Commissioners,<sup>1</sup> the fraudulent purpose was neither directed against some one in particular, nor was it intended to be immediately put into execution. But all the same it was the object present in the mind of parties. In such a case, it may not be always easy to connect the two events, and indeed, the longer the interval the greater is the difficulty of associating one with the other. But there are practical difficulties which the rules in practice present, and on account of which they have practically remained a dead letter.

2229. Meaning of Words.—“Causes or suffers”: Causes on admission, suffers in default.

2230. Suffering Fraudulent Decree.—The presence of fraud is the essential ingredient of this offence. If fraud was absent there is then no offence, though a person may have suffered a decree for a sum not due. Such a decree may be suffered by any one having nothing to do, or one who knows of no defence to resist the suit. For example, the plaintiff may sue for recovery of a barred debt, and the defendant may not know that the suit against him is barred. It will be a suit for a sum not due, and the defendant may suffer a decree in sheer ignorance of his right. The phrase “sum not due” is ambiguous, for it may mean a sum owing, or a sum payable and recoverable. The fact that the sum was owing does not necessarily make it payable and vice versa. For, the debt may be barred by time, tainted by illegality, or it may have been incurred by a person incompetent to contract. Again, a sum may be due in the sense that it was merely promised, as where a person executes a gratuitous agreement to pay a sum of money, in which case the obligee becomes entitled to enforce it irrespective of consideration. Such an agreement may or may not be fraudulent. If it is not fraudulent, it may result in a decree for a sum not due in the sense that it was never borrowed, but it cannot be made the cause of complaint, because though not due in the one sense, it was due in the other sense in that it was recoverable in law, and in any case, the defendant did not suffer a decree to be passed against himself fraudulently.

(1) 2nd Rep., s. 159.

2231. In such transactions, therefore, the first question to ask is, not whether the sum decreed was due but whether the decree was suffered fraudulently. This is a question of fact, and dependent upon a variety of circumstances. Indeed, fraud is hydra-headed and it is not often possible to dive into the motives of men; but if the facts of a case point to circumstances proving that the object of the defendant in suffering a decree was to defraud some one, the rest of the case should be easy, for all that then remains is to prove that the decree was for an imaginary or exaggerated claim. Without proof of this, the defendant commits no offence, howmuchsoever fraudulent his conduct might otherwise have been. For example, the debtor may set up a creditor to file a suit to enforce his heavy claim and his sole object in inciting him to sue him may be to crush another poor creditor in a rateable distribution of his available assets. Such conduct may not be commendable, but it is not criminal.

209. Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly, or with intent to injure or annoy any person, makes in a Court of Justice any claim which he knows to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Dishonestly making false claim in Court.

2232. Analogous Law.—This section has a larger application than the last section. It applies equally to a dishonest as well as a collusive plaintiff. In short, it will apply whether the object of the plaintiff in instituting the false suit was to benefit himself, to harass the defendant, or to defraud a third party.

2233. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be validly instituted under this section without the previous complaint of the Court concerned.<sup>1</sup> The accused had obtained a decree of the Court of Small Causes in the Central Provinces. The defendant sued him successfully in the Court in Behar for the cancellation of his decree on the ground of fraud. This decree was transferred to the District Court for execution. This Court ordered prosecution of the fraudulent decree-holder under this section, and the question arising whether the Court in Behar had jurisdiction to order prosecution for a fraudulent decree obtained in the Central Provinces, it was held that s. 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code conferred upon the District Court in Behar such jurisdiction.<sup>2</sup> Both under this and the next section, the question of jurisdiction of the Court adjudicating the claim as false, is immaterial,<sup>3</sup> since the offence is completed as soon as the claim is made; it is immaterial who disposes it off and how.

2234. The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class.

- (1) That a claim was made in a Court of Justice.
- (2) That the accused made it.
- (3) That it was a false claim.
- (4) That the accused knew it to be false.
- (5) That he made it, intending to defraud or to cause wrongful gain or loss, or to injure or annoy any person.

2236. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—
 “ That you—on or about the—day of—at—fraudulently (or dishonestly or with intent to injure or annoy any person) made a claim, to wit—(specify the claim) in suit No.—of—in the Court of—and which you knew to be false, and thereby committed an offence under s. 209 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.”
 “ And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

(2) Rajkumar Singh, 1 Pat. L. J. 298.

(3) Badri, 52 I. C. (A.) 666.

2237. Principle.—This section affords an apt illustration of the policy of law against lending the machinery of Court for the purpose of fraud or dishonesty or illegal injury or annoyance of another person. The Court is the sanctuary of truth, and law would not allow of its being debased to encourage illegitimate gain or harassment.

2238. Meaning of Words.—“Makes any claim” : The claim may relate to money or money's worth, title, status, or dignity, or indeed, to any relief whatever. It has, of course, no reference to a document produced in support of the claim.<sup>1</sup>

2240. Again, the mere making of a false claim is not an offence. It must be made with the knowledge that it is a false claim. It is not enough to shew that the claim is one which the plaintiff believed or had reason to believe to be false, or did not believe to be true.<sup>5</sup> It must be shown that the claim was false, and the accused knew it at the time he made it. Knowledge cannot be inferred from mere falsehood, though the fact that a claim was false may reasonably raise an inference that the claimant might and ought to have been aware of it. Sometimes the question is one which may exercise the most trained intellect. At other times it is one upon which there may be no room for a reasonable doubt. It may be, however, safely laid down that where a claim depends upon a question of law or upon the validity of a custom having the force of law, and not upon a question of fact, it will generally be found to be impossible to establish the charge, and it is a case in which the Court might well exercise its discretion in sanctioning a prosecution.<sup>6</sup> For the word “make” is not necessarily restricted only to the plaintiff. If the principal was equally aware of the false claim, he would then be equally liable, for, criminal liability under this section depends upon knowledge and the presence of intention to be discussed presently. Where a person knowingly makes a false claim and for that purpose, falsely verifies the plaint, he can only be convicted of one or the other, but not of both. And since false verification was necessary to launch a false claim, this is the only section appropriate to such a case.<sup>7</sup> It must be made with any of the object specified in the section, i.e., it must be made fraudulently, dishonestly, or with intent to injure or annoy any person. The effect contemplated may be produced on any person not necessarily his adversary in the suit. For instance, a person may injure C who is B's creditor by suing him to enforce a false claim.

2242. In such a case, both the parties may be animated by the common desire to injure a third party and it may be, that in so colluding to the injury of a third party, both have contravened the law, and made themselves obnoxious to its penalties. The false claim must be made in a Court of Justice, and by which is intended the Civil Court.<sup>1</sup> The section does not apply to a Criminal Court, nor can a complaint that the person complained against may be punished, can be regarded as a claim within the meaning of this section. So again, an attempt to execute a decree after it has been once satisfied, is not a claim made in a Court of Justice, though it is an offence under the provisions of the next section.<sup>2</sup>

2243. Then, again, coupled with the knowledge of a false claim there must be either fraud, dishonesty or intention to injure or annoy anybody. A knowingly false claim need not be necessarily dishonest, for the object may be to protect the property against the claims of hostile creditors. It need not be necessarily fraudulent, because the plaintiff may not intend to defraud any one in particular. He may know that his claim is too absurd to be decreed, but his sole object in instituting it may be to injure his creditor or annoy him in the meantime. It may again be a purely fraudulent contrivance to thwart an expected execution or defeat an impending claim. The section is, indeed, so generally worded that it may embrace cases also falling within the comprehension of the next sections.

2244. Analogous Law.—This section is the counterpart of s. 208, and must be read as a continuation of it. It deals with exactly the same offence as affecting the decree-holder, as that section deals with a judgment-debtor. The two sections together have the effect of making both parties punishable as principal offenders, instead of their being merely liable as abettor of each other.

2245. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section without the previous complaint of the Court,<sup>3</sup> in which the fraudulent claim was made. Where, therefore, a part of the claim made by the accused being disallowed by one Court, he filed another suit in another Court and obtained an ex parte decree, the Court which is to complain is the latter Court.<sup>1</sup> The fact that the fraudulent act did not prejudice the representative of the judgment-debtor, is no ground for withholding complaint which should be made if it would be in the interest of justice.<sup>2</sup> But no prosecution is called for if the overstatement of a claim was due to a mistake or negligence but not necessarily imputable to fraud.<sup>3</sup> The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and it is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

(2) Ib., p. 38.

(3) S. 195, Cr. P. C.

2246. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused obtained the decree or order, or permitted or suffered the same to be done in his name;
- (2) That the decree or order was for a sum not due,<sup>4</sup> or for a larger sum than is due, or for any property or interest in property to which the accused was not entitled,
- (3) Or the accused fraudulently caused a decree or order to be executed against any person after it has been satisfied, or for anything, in respect of which it has been satisfied,
- (4) Or the accused permitted or suffered acts as in (2) or (3) to be done in his name ;
- (5) That the accused did as above fraudulently.

2247. Charge.—That the charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you—on or about—day of—, at—, fraudulently obtained a decree (or order) in suit No.—of—against—for Rs.—which was not due (or was a larger sum than was due, or for any property or interest in property to which you are not entitled) [or fraudulently caused a decree or order to be executed against—after it had been satisfied (or fraudulently suffered or permitted any such act to be done in your name)], and thereby committed an offence under s. 210 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

2248. Principle.—This section is the counterpart of s. 208, the two together dealing with fraudulent plaintiff and defendant. Section 208 deals with fraudulent defendant and this section deals with fraudulent plaintiff. The crux of the crime is the presence of fraud, and its presence may be detected in many circumstances to which reference has been made elsewhere (§ 2210).

2250. It is, therefore, essential that the demand should be illegal and it must have been enforced fraudulently. The fact that the demand was excessive or for a sum not due does not dispense with the proof of fraud. For a person may make an improper demand owing to ignorance, or mistake, or misconception of his legal rights. The offence under this section is committed only if a decree or order is passed, or a decree or order is executed. If a false claim is made and dismissed, the offence may fall under s. 209 but it does not fall under this section. The "decree or order" must, as a rule, refer to the decree or order obtained in the Civil Court, or a Court performing the functions of the Civil Court. But as the section is worded, there would, at first sight, appear to be nothing against its being inapplicable to an order for any property passed by a Criminal Court, as, for example, an order passed under s. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But such an order can only be declaratory, and it can only be described as an order in respect of, and not for, any property. An order passed by a Criminal Court could not therefore be regarded as falling within the terms of the section. But as Revenue Courts are empowered to pass a decree or order in cases placed within their jurisdiction, a decree or order so passed would be within the rule, if it fulfils its other requirement.

2251. In establishing a case under this section, all that the Court is concerned with is the passing of a decree or order in execution. Other proceedings of the Civil Court are irrelevant. The fact that the decree was set aside by the Civil Court on the ground of fraud, would be no evidence of fraud, which it would be necessary to establish by independent evidence. But it has been said that the fact that the decree was not set aside, might be admissible as evidence to prove that there was no fraud, though it is no bar to a prosecution.<sup>1</sup> But it is submitted that if it is inadmissible for one purpose, it is equally inadmissible, and for the same reason, for another purpose. The finding that there was no fraud, may appeal to the moral conviction of the Court but it is scarcely evidence in a criminal trial. Indeed, in cases of damages arising out of malicious prosecution of the Criminal Court, it has been held to be wholly inadmissible in the Civil Court; but if so it must be vice versa.

2253. And in the case of execution, the offence of fraudulently causing a decree, wholly or in part satisfied, to be executed is not completed as soon as an application for execution is presented, or when the judgment-debtor is summoned to show cause why it should not be executed. It is only complete, if the judgment-debtor appears and either makes no objection, or if he makes an objection it is overruled, and the Court has thereupon proceeded to order execution.<sup>4</sup> If upon hearing the judgment-debtor's objection the Court refuses to execute the decree, the decree-holder does not cause a decree to be executed, and there is no scope for the operation of this section.<sup>5</sup> Nor would such a case fall under the provisions of the last section. For an attempt to execute a decree cannot be described as false claim.

2254. Again, the order for execution must have been passed in a decree after it has been satisfied. These words are large enough to include any satisfaction whether by payment, adjustment or composition, and whether the satisfaction is or is not certified by the Court. In other words, if there is a satisfaction made and accepted, then it is binding on the conscience of the decree-holder and he should not have applied for execution. As was observed by Mitter and Macpherson, JJ., the words "after it has been satisfied" only indicate the fact of its satisfaction. "Merely because the satisfaction is of such a nature that the Court executing the decree could not recognize it, would not take the case out of the purview of the section.”<sup>1</sup> Indeed, the rule<sup>2</sup> that uncertified payments shall not be recognised by any Court executing the decree,<sup>3</sup> has no application to a Court other than the executing Court.<sup>4</sup>

2255. It may then be that in respect of an uncertified payment the judgment-debtor may not be able to claim credit in execution, but he may nevertheless successfully prosecute his dishonest decree-holder under this section.

211. Whoever, with intent to cause injury to any person, institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding against that person, or falsely charges any person with having committed an offence, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge against that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both ;

and if such criminal proceeding be instituted on a false charge of an offence punishable with death, transportation for life, or imprisonment for seven years or upwards, shall be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

2256. Analogous Law.—This section and section 182 possess many elements in common, and it has sometimes been a question whether the provisions of the two sections do not overlap each other. And the Courts have felt some difficulty in laying down a practical working rule to determine their applicability. It would have been probably a distinction without a difference, if the question had no ulterior effect beyond that involved in suiting their provisions to a given case. But the question assumes a graver complexion inasmuch as, while an offence under s. 182 is triable by a second class Magistrate, one under this section is triable only by a first class Magistrate, and in certain cases exclusively by the Court of Session.

2257. The distinction has consequently attracted the attention of all Courts, though they are not agreed as to the view to take of the two sections. According to the view taken in Calcutta, there is no radical difference between the two sections and it is open to a Magistrate to proceed under either section, although in cases of more serious nature it may be that the proper course is to proceed under s. 211.<sup>5</sup> A distinction was sought to be drawn between the two sections in an old case,<sup>6</sup> but its authority was much shaken by the later cases<sup>7</sup> and it is now regarded as overruled.<sup>8</sup> This view is echoed by the Madras and Patna High Courts<sup>9</sup> in whose opinion the difference between the two sections is only the difference of degree, there being nothing legally wrong in a conviction under either section on the same facts. “It has been held,” they observe, “after much consideration, and after a full review of the difficulties felt elsewhere, that, where the evidence discloses an offence of a graver character without the jurisdiction of the tribunal, this Court may quash the conviction and sentence for the minor offence, and direct a trial before a tribunal having jurisdiction for the graver. It has also been repeatedly held, that whether it will do so or not, is a question, not of law, but of expediency on the facts of the particular case."<sup>1</sup> This appears to have been conceded by Straight, J., in an Allahabad case, where, however, he remarked that when a specific false charge is made, this section is the more appropriate.<sup>2</sup> But in a later case it was admitted that the distinction between the two sections was illusory. "We are unable to ascertain," they said, "that there is any restriction imposed by the Indian Penal Code or by the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882 upon the prosecution of an offence either under s. 182 or s. 211. It appears to us that it has been left to the discretion of the Court, to determine when and under what circumstances prosecutions should be proceeded with under ss. 182 and 211."<sup>3</sup>

2258. There is thus a substantial agreement between the two Courts, but a discordant note has been struck by the Bombay High Court where a clear distinction has been held to exist between a false charge which falls under this section, and a false information given to the police, in which latter case the offence falls under s. 182.<sup>4</sup> This view has been assented to in the Punjab.<sup>5</sup> But neither view is free from difficulty, for the view that the two sections are identical, charges the legislature with wanton redundancy, while the view based upon the distinction between "information" and "charge" is at times scarcely perceptible and is never marked. The fact appears to be that the earlier section was intended to apply to a report made to the police or an officer other than a Magistrate competent to inquire into the case, while the present section would seem to apply to a definite accusation preferred in a Court of law. If this was the intention, the language used in the two sections is inapt, but, nevertheless, it would seem to suggest some such distinction, as may probably be better appreciated by examining them as set out below:—

"Whoever gives to any public servant any information which he knows or believes to be false, etc."

"S. 211.

"Whoever, with intent to cause injury to any person institutes, or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding against that person, or falsely charges any person with having committed an offence knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge against that person, shall be etc."

2260. Again, the amount of criminality in the two cases has to be measured by the fact that knowledge or belief in the falsity of information in the one case

(5) Roora, (1870) P. R. No. 16, F. B.; Todur Mal v. Mt. Bholi, (1882) P. R. No. 14.

(6) This must be only presumed out of respect to the legislature. It will not stand the test of closer examination, for the Code is unfortunately in too many places redundant and contains two or more sections to describe the same offence; E.g., Cf. ss. 206-209 and ss. 421-424, s. 417 and s. 420.

is sufficient, while knowledge and not mere belief in the falsity of the charge is an essential ingredient of the offence here described. Indeed not only must the offence be false, but there must be no just or lawful ground for the prosecution. An offender against s. 182 need not possess malice or want of reasonable and probable cause except so far as they are implied in the act of giving false information, with the knowledge or likelihood, that such information would lead a public servant to use his power to the injury or annoyance of the person informed against. But in a case, arising under this section the absence of just and lawful grounds or reasonable and probable cause, is an essential element,<sup>1</sup> and so is the intent to injure, or in a word, malice. Looked at from the stand-point, the two offences may be regarded as two aspects of the same crime, and it would be an improvement to coalesce them into one offence.

2261. However, as the sections now stand, the distinction between them should be marked. The present section itself includes two distinct offences, namely, (i) making a false charge, and (ii) instituting or causing to be instituted, a false criminal proceeding. The former is implied in the latter, but it may be committed when no criminal proceedings follow,<sup>2</sup> that is to say, while the first paragraph applies to an information laid before the police the second paragraph more appropriately applies to a charge made in Court.<sup>3</sup>

2262. Procedure and Practice.—The offence is non-cognizable,<sup>4</sup> but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable exclusively by the Court of Session, if the offence falsely charged be capital or punishable with transportation for life; but if it is punishable with imprisonment for seven years or upwards, then it is triable also by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class; and in any other case, it is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. The offence is not triable summarily.<sup>5</sup> A person acquitted of this charge cannot be retried under s. 182.<sup>6</sup>

2264. The making of a complaint is, of course, a judicial act, and it does not follow that because a case has failed it is necessarily a false case, and one calling for a judicial prosecution. In considering the necessity of ordering a prosecution the Court should not only apply itself to the merits of the case, but should consider the chances of the prosecution resulting in a conviction. For as the Court said; "It would be disastrous if there were a number of prosecutions ending not in convictions, but in acquittals."<sup>9</sup> It is scarcely necessary to add that the failure of the prosecution to prove the charge is no proof of its falsity which would have to be proved like any other fact when the tables are turned upon the complainant, and that, in order to secure a conviction of this offence, the proof required must clearly establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the circumstances are not merely consistent with the guilt of the accused, but wholly inconsistent with his innocence.<sup>1</sup>

2266. The question has been sometimes raised, whether it is legal for a Court to order a person's prosecution for making a false charge, without giving him an opportunity of establishing it. Should this be invariably permitted before recording the order, or should this be left for the accused to establish in his defence to his prosecution for a charge under this section? Such a question cannot arise where the prosecution of a person under this section is sanctioned by a judicial officer after a judicial inquiry, for that inquiry gives him an opportunity of making good his charge. The question has really arisen in cases in which the charge was only made to the police, who upon inquiry found it to be false. Naturally this question is independent of the question, before discussed, as to the distinction between this section and section 182. For, whether a person inform against or charge a person, the question arising is the same. Is he entitled to an opportunity to prove its truth, before he is prosecuted for making a false charge?

is illegal, still it is not alone sufficient to vitiate a conviction.<sup>1</sup> But in one case where the Magistrate has sent down a complaint made against one police officer to another, for inquiry and report, and upon receipt of his report, he ordered the complainant's prosecution, the High Court set aside his order, holding that the complaint should have been made the subject of a magisterial enquiry.<sup>2</sup> Of course, no such enquiry is necessary where the charge has already been disposed of in a cross or connected case to which the accused was a party.<sup>3</sup>

2269. But the question of the necessity of inquiry suggests other questions :

Complaint when Unnecessary.

(i) Is an order at all necessary in a case which has ended with the police ; (ii) if so, does an order become necessary if it is reported to the Magistrate for orders ; (iii) and in the last case is the Magistrate bound to ignore the police inquiry and report, and make an inquiry of his own to give the accused, the requisite opportunity of proving his case and (iv) if he does not do so, is his complaint on that account void ?

2270. The last question has nothing to do with the voidability of a conviction in a case of defective order, for, as has been held in the case last cited, a conviction otherwise good cannot be disturbed merely on account of that defect. Now as regards the first question, its determination depends upon the language used in section 195 of the Procedure Code, which makes provision for complaint before institution of a case under this section. It provides that no Court shall take cognizance of an offence punishable (inter alia) under this section, when such offence is committed in, or in relation to any proceeding in any Court, except on the complaint of such Court, or of some other Court, to which such other Court is subordinate.<sup>4</sup> It is therefore obvious that, if the offence is not committed in or in relation to any proceeding in Court the section does not place the bar of sanction to a valid prosecution. In such cases then a prosecution may be initiated without complaint,<sup>5</sup> and on the mere complaint of the police-officer concerned or the person aggrieved. In such case the accused has no chance of appealing to the Magistrate to re-hear his case, for the Magistrate was not concerned in his prosecution, and all he has to say could then be only proved in his defence.

2271. But the police seldom take upon themselves the responsibility of embarking on a counter prosecution of this nature. They usually report the case for the orders of the District Magistrate, and it is then for him to see whether a prosecution under this section should, or should not be started. He may do so by either taking cognizance of the case under section 190 of the Procedure Code,<sup>6</sup> or he may merely order the prosecution, in which case, his order is open to correction.

2272. It has been held that though the Magistrate may dispense with the necessity of a complaint by acting under section 190 of the Procedure Code, still it would not be the exercise of sound judicial discretion. For, a Magistrate is not well advised in embarking upon a prosecution under this section, upon a mere police-report made in another case, against a person who has not the opportunity of showing cause against it. Such report must necessarily relate to the substantive charge, and the report could only create a suspicion against the person to be tried under this section. The proper course commended by the Full Bench then is to refrain from ordering a prosecution until "some person aggrieved has complained, or until he has before him a police-report on the subject, based on an investigation directed to the offence to be tried, and in cases of alleged false charge, until it is clear that the original charge has been either heard and dismissed or abandoned ; and I should add that, before the order to prosecute for a false charge is made, the person who made the original charge should be offered an opportunity of supporting it or abandoning it.”<sup>1</sup>

2273. This case disposes of the third and fourth questions above raised. For, with reference to the third question, it may be said that the Magistrate is not bound to ignore the police inquiry, but as a matter of sound judicial precaution, he must not allow himself to be controlled by it. He must still keep an open mind, and call upon the person to be charged to show cause, hear him and his evidence, consider the desirability of ordering his prosecution and pass through his mind's eye its probable results. But the fact that the Magistrate does not hear the accused, does not render his order invalid,<sup>2</sup> though it is a point which the appellate Court will not fail to consider in adjudicating upon its propriety. And in such a case, it is open to the accused to file a complaint in the Court of a Magistrate reiterating his charge, and in which case it will be the duty of the Magistrate to examine the complainant and dispose of his complaint according to law.<sup>3</sup> It will then be for the Magistrate to decide, whether the complaint filed was such as justified the complainant's prosecution under this section, and if he is of that opinion, his proper course is to order his prosecution. In such a case it will be wrong to let him off with a fine under section 250 of the Procedure Code.<sup>4</sup> On the other hand, it will be equally wrong to order his prosecution on the mere failure of the charge made by him. For, in order to justify his prosecution, there must be evidence that the charge he had made was both false and malicious.<sup>5</sup>

2274. The sanctioning of a prosecution against the accused may thus sometimes lead to this awkward result. The District Magistrate may order his prosecution. The accused feeling aggrieved may complain to a Magistrate offering to substantiate his charge. The Magistrate is bound to inquire into his complaint, and while this is being done, what becomes of the complaint against him? Is it to go on, or should it abate? One thing is certain that he cannot be tried for making a false charge, when the charge itself is sub judice.<sup>6</sup> In such a case, the prosecution following on the complaint, must pend till the disposal of the main case, or it should be revoked, for the Magistrate before whom the complaint is made, would himself complain if it is justified by the case before him. If, on the other hand, the case is one in which an order for compensation under section 250 of the Procedure Code, would meet the ends of justice, an order under that section would be passed. But such an order does not bar a prosecution under this section, nor does it amount to a conviction under this section in a summary proceeding.<sup>7</sup>

2275. If three persons A, B, and C complain to the police, and then one of them C complains to the Magistrate, his complaint is requisite for the prosecution of any or all of them.<sup>8</sup> If a person reports to the police who take no action; he then lodges a complaint in Court; the accused must ask the court to complain, since the matter reported to the police has passed into a judicial proceeding.<sup>1</sup> A person who has applied for and failed to secure complaint for the prosecution of his adversary under this section cannot, on the same facts, institute proceedings against him under s. 500 of the Indian Penal Code.<sup>2</sup>

2276. Effect of Defective Complaint.—The accused has the right to be discharged if his prosecution was instituted without complaint, if a complaint was necessary, or if the complaint made has since been revoked. But so long as the sanction exists, the prosecution following upon it is legal. It is, however, open to the Court to consider the legality of the complaint though it is precluded from considering its propriety.<sup>3</sup> That is to say, while no Court is bound to give effect to an order passed without jurisdiction, it cannot examine the correctness or propriety of the order made, if it is once shown to be within the jurisdiction of the Court that passed it. For instance, if the Magistrate decides to complain while the substantive proceedings are pending, or without giving the accused an opportunity of being heard, and without waiting to hear his evidence, the order may be wrong, and may be set aside on appeal, but it is not one which affects the trial of the accused before a Magistrate, nor can the Magistrate refuse to proceed with the trial on that ground.<sup>4</sup>

2277. No Case for Complaint.—It is needless to state that the mere failure of the prosecution is of itself no proof of its falsity.<sup>5</sup> And the fact that there was a conviction by one Court and acquittal by another, the two Courts differing on the merits of the case, showed to the superior Court that it should forbear from directing a prosecution.<sup>6</sup> There is no case for complaint where a person merely expressed his suspicions without making an accusation.<sup>7</sup> Where the Court had disposed of the case, fining the complainant under s. 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and three weeks later issued a notice to show cause why he should not be prosecuted of this offence, the High Court quashed the proceedings as improper.<sup>8</sup>

- (1) That a criminal proceeding was instituted or a charge made against some person.
- (2) That it was the accused who either instituted such criminal proceeding or caused them to be instituted, or made the a charge.<sup>9</sup>
- (3) That the charge or proceeding accused that person of an offence.
- (4) That his accusation was both false and malicious.<sup>10</sup>
- (5) That he then knew that there were no just or lawful grounds for instituting the criminal proceeding or making the charge.

2279. Of course having regard to the gravity of an offence under this section all the points necessary for constituting the offence must be clearly established by the prosecution, upon whom rests the burden of proving absence of just and lawful grounds for the criminal proceedings. For this purpose the prosecution have to call independent evidence. They cannot rely on the deposition of witnesses recorded in the case in which the substantive charge was the subject-matter of inquiry. These depositions are not evidence in a subsequent case, except for the purpose of contradicting a witness, if necessary.<sup>11</sup> Where facts are as consistent with a prisoner's innocence, as with his guilt, innocence must be presumed, and criminal intent or knowledge is not necessarily imputable to every man who acts contrary to the provisions of law.<sup>12</sup> It is then the duty of the prosecution to make out at least a prima facie case on all the points requiring proof, and which should bring home to the accused the charge that his accusation was not only false but malicious, and that he knew it to be so at the time he made it. When so much is established, it will then be upon the accused to rebut the charge, and for that purpose he may shew that he merely acted upon information, and that he believed in the charge he made.<sup>1</sup> In such case, the difference between the prosecution and the accused is this, the former have to establish by evidence, clear, cogent and consistent, that the charge made by the accused was false, that he knew it to be so, and that he made it in malice. The accused may disprove it by merely shewing that there was no malice, or that if there was malice, the charge was true and not false, or that he did not know it to be false.

2280. Charge.—The accused charged under this section is entitled to know the specific nature of the false charge of which he is accused. It must, therefore, be clearly set out in the charge (§ 2172), which should run thus:—

“ That you—on or about the day of—at—with intent to cause injury to one—instituted criminal proceedings before—charging the said—with having committed the offence of—[or falsely charged the said—before—with having committed the offence of—knowing at the time that there was no just or lawful ground for such proceeding (or charge) against the said—] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

2281. Principle.—There are three essential ingredients of an offence under this section, and they distinguish it, so far as it is distinguishable, from the other offence described, in s. 182, namely (i) intend to injure, (ii) falsehood of the charge, and (iii) malice. The offence requires the presence of all these three ingredients, and if any of them is wanting it is not complete, though the offence may then fall under the provisions of the earlier section.

2282. As to the offence itself, the section recognizes the two degrees of its gravity, according as the charge relates to offences punishable with imprisonment for seven years or more, or otherwise. The former is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to seven years, the latter with imprisonment which may extend only to two years or with only fine or both. There is yet another distinction made between the offences dealt with in the two paragraphs. An offence under the first paragraph requires only that there should be a false charge or a criminal proceeding. But the second paragraph requires that there should be a criminal proceeding instituted on a false charge. Now as it is not necessary that a criminal proceeding should necessarily be instituted on a false charge, the mere making of a false charge, whatever may be the offence charged, would only be punishable under the first paragraph. It is only where the charge is followed up by the institution of a criminal proceeding that the second paragraph becomes applicable. The gravity of the offence may then depend not only upon the gravity of the offence charged, but also upon, whether the accused did or did not institute criminal proceeding on that false charge. In short, in order to render him liable to the enhanced penalty provided by the second paragraph, it is not only essential that the accused should have made a charge, but also that he should have instituted criminal proceedings on that charge.

2283. Meaning of Words.—“ With intent to cause injury,” that is, intention to injure another must have been the primary and dominant motive of the offender.<sup>2</sup> “ Institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding ” : Institution simply means filing. It does not require that there should be any further steps taken. A criminal proceeding is merely setting the criminal law in motion, but it must be either before the police or a Magistrate competent to inquire into the case. A mere information to the police in a cognizable case is instituting a criminal proceeding.<sup>3</sup> but an information to the police in a non-cognizable case is not instituting criminal proceeding,<sup>1</sup> though it would be making a false charge. "Or falsely charges any person," i.e., accuses any person to a person in authority. A complaint to a private person or to one who has no direct power to set the machinery of criminal law in motion is not a false charge within the meaning of this section.<sup>2</sup> The charge must further desire the authority concerned to use that power to the prejudice of the complainant. Where, therefore, the accused had applied that his complaint should be inquired into by the Magistrate, because the police had ill-treated him, he could not be prosecuted of this offence.<sup>3</sup> Nor can the accused be held liable for this offence if he did not charge, but merely answered questions put to him.<sup>4</sup> "Knowing that there is no just or lawful grounds": This is equivalent of the English phrase "without reasonable or probable cause," the meaning of which will have to be presently discussed. This phrase constitutes the mens rea and it must be established by the prosecution.<sup>5</sup>

2284. Who "Institutes" or "Charges".—This is the nemesis of offenders who seek to avail themselves of the machinery of criminal law for the gratification of their ill-feeling, and who for that purpose falsely accuse another and expose him to the risk of a conviction. The section requires that the penalties attaching to the offence should only be visited upon him, who (i) sets the criminal law in motion, (ii) not only falsely but also without any just or lawful grounds; his primary and predominant intention being to cause injury to the person so falsely accused through the medium of criminal law, and not otherwise.<sup>6</sup> In a case arising under this section the first thing to establish is that it was the accused who instituted or caused to be instituted the criminal proceeding or made the false charge in question. This raises the question, what is institution of a criminal proceeding? This phrase has been held to mean nothing more or less than the setting of criminal law in motion. A complaint to the police, in respect of an offence which they are competent to deal with, is thereby setting the police in motion, and it is therefore instituting a criminal proceeding.<sup>7</sup>

2285. As Wilson, J., in delivering the judgment of the Full Bench<sup>8</sup> of the Calcutta High Court, remarked: "There are two modes in which a person aggrieved may seek to put the criminal law in motion. He may make a charge, or in the language of the Procedure Code, give information to the police. If the information discloses a cognizable offence, the proper officer of police may proceed to make an investigation; and if the result of that investigation is adverse to the accused, he is in due course brought by the police before the Magistrate. All this forms the subject of Chapter XIV of the Procedure Code. If the information does not disclose a cognizable offence, the police cannot take any step of their own authority. Secondly, a person aggrieved may lay a charge, or as the Code calls it, a complaint before a Magistrate."<sup>9</sup>

2286. These are then the two modes of instituting a criminal proceeding, and in each case the proceedings are instituted as soon as the complaint is made.

But this view, though taken in Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, has been dissented from in some cases of the Allahabad Court,<sup>1</sup> where the view taken of the meaning of this phrase, is based upon the distinction which the section undoubtedly makes, between a false charge and the institution of a criminal proceeding. According to the Allahabad view, the mere making of a complaint, whether before the police or the Magistrate, is merely making a charge. Following upon that charge there must be institution of a criminal proceeding, and which means the taking of some action against the person so charged.<sup>2</sup>

2287. This much is conceded in Bombay,<sup>3</sup> and was not wholly denied in the Full Bench case of the Calcutta High Court, for Wilson, J., said: "I agree in this reasoning in one sense, and not in another. I agree that we must take it that the Legislature did not regard the two phrases as co-extensive in meaning, but considered that they were, or might be, cases to which the one would apply and not the other. But I do not think that we are to suppose that the Legislature meant the phrase to be mutually exclusive in meaning, so that the instituting of criminal proceedings must be by something which is not a charge, and a charge must be something which is not the institution of criminal proceedings. This cannot, I think, be for two reasons. First, because there is no mode by which a private accuser can institute criminal proceedings, except by making a charge; and if he does not do it by the charge, he never does it at all, to whatever length the proceedings may go; and secondly, because the last part of the section speaks of proceedings instituted on a false charge."<sup>4</sup>

2288. So far as the first part of the section is concerned, the use of the two phrases present no difficulty, for whether a given act amounts to a false charge or the instituting of a criminal proceeding, the penalty is the same, and the difference is thus inconsequential. But the difference between the two phrases becomes material, when we have to consider the applicability of the second paragraph. Here the Full Bench meet the difficulty by pointing to the change of phraseology. But this change is scarcely material, for the language used in the second paragraph, is not merely "proceedings instituted on a false charge," but "such proceedings instituted on a false charge," and which connects it with the corresponding phrase in the first paragraph, and from which it follows that the two must be read in the same sense.

2289. But the Calcutta view suggests another difficulty of construction which is not otherwise surmountable. It refers to cases of breach of peace or of good behaviour,<sup>5</sup> which are apparently criminal proceedings, but which do not necessarily involve a charge of any offence. "On the other hand, a charge to the police of non-cognizable offence, may very possibly be a charge within the meaning of this section, but could hardly be called the institution of criminal proceedings. So a charge made to the Judge of a Civil Court; or to public officers of other kinds, in order to obtain sanction to prosecute, may well be a charge, but is not the institution of criminal proceedings."<sup>6</sup> In this view, a man who sets the criminal law in motion, by making a false charge to the police of a cognizable offence, institutes criminal proceedings within the meaning of this section. But the making of a false charge to the police, of a non-cognizable offence, does not amount to the institution of a criminal proceeding, though it will be so in either case, if the complaint is made to a Magistrate. But there must be a false charge of an offence made to him. For, if a person merely complains of the breach of a civil right, invoking his aid to secure its enforcement, there can be no prosecution, even if the complaint made was false. Such was the case of the accused who prayed a Magistrate to compel the prosecutor to execute a conveyance of a house, which he was alleged to have sold to him, or to return him his purchase money, failing which, he was to be punished criminally.<sup>1</sup>

2290. The word "charge" as used here, means an accusation. But it is not every accusation which attracts the penalty of this section. It must be an accusation to a person in authority, that is, one who is bound by law to investigate into the matter, or to take any step in regard to it (§ 2291); a fortiori a complaint to a private person or to one who has no direct power to set the criminal law in motion is not a false charge within the meaning of this section.<sup>2</sup> It must, again, be a definite accusation and not merely a suggestion or an expression of suspicion. The word "charge" as here used means something different from "gives information."<sup>3</sup> It is something more than reporting what one knows of the facts, stating one's suspicions and leaving the matter to be further investigated by the authorities.<sup>4</sup> (§ 2292). The words "false charge" must be construed with reference to the institution of criminal proceeding. That must be his object, though he may not have expressly prayed for it. (§ 2294).

2291. It is necessary for a conviction under this section that the false charge should have been made to a Court or officer having jurisdiction to investigate and send it up for trial.<sup>5</sup> So where the accused falsely charged another of an offence before a Military Officer having neither magisterial nor police powers, he could not be held to be guilty of an offence under this section,<sup>6</sup> though he may be prosecuted for defamation<sup>7</sup> and it may even amount to an offence under s. 182.<sup>8</sup> But an accusation of murder made to a village Magistrate, who had under a local regulation<sup>9</sup> authority to arrest any person whom he suspects of having committed the murder of a person, whose body is found within his jurisdiction, is a "charge" within this section, even though it does not amount to the institution of criminal proceedings, and even though no criminal proceedings follow it, owing to the police on investigation, referring the charge as false.<sup>10</sup> Of course, to constitute the offence of making a false charge under this section, all that is necessary is that the false charge is made. It is not necessary that any prosecution should be instituted thereon. The offence consists, not in the prosecution of a false complaint, but in the making of it.<sup>11</sup> It is not, therefore, necessary that summons should be issued upon such complaint,<sup>12</sup> or that if made to the police, it should have reduced it to writing as required by law, for the test is what the accused did and intend, and not what others did or did not do.<sup>13</sup>

2292. No Charge: No False Charge.—There must, however, be a false charge made, or a criminal proceeding instituted against some person. A false charge must be a definite accusation, and not merely the expression of a suspicion. A statement made to the police of a suspicion that a particular person has committed an offence, is not a "charge" within the meaning of this section, nor does it amount to the institution of a criminal proceeding against that person, so as to justify his conviction under this section, on the suspicion being proved to be unfounded.<sup>14</sup> So where the accused reported a case of dacoity in his house by a gang of 30 or 35 men, whom he said he was unable to recognise in the dark, but added: "Mohesh Roy was one of the dacoits, I suspect him because he is my enemy." The police inquired and reported the case as false, whereupon the District Magistrate ordered the prosecution of the accused. It was found that he had falsely identified Mohesh's property as his, and had fabricated false evidence, by breaking the staple of a door in his house, in proof of the dacoity. But it was held that the accusation of Mohesh Roy did not amount to a false charge, but only amounted to providing the police with a possible clue for investigating the matter which they might or might not follow up as they considered fit. Moreover, it could not be said that Mohesh was accused, knowing that there were no just grounds for the accusation.<sup>1</sup>

2293. In another case the accused has presented a petition to the District Magistrate, for leave to inspect the Municipal file, to enable him to take criminal proceedings against a Municipal employee, for having distributed voting papers to unauthorized persons, with intent to injure him. It was held that as the accused had preferred no charge, but merely adduced a reason for being permitted to inspect the file, he could not be prosecuted under this section.<sup>2</sup> So in another case certain petitions said to emanate from the accused, were received by Government, charging a Deputy Collector of Bijapur with bribery and corruption. The Government sent them to the District Magistrate for inquiry, and he enforced the attendance of the accused through the police. The accused being questioned denied his authorship of the petitions, but on being questioned he stated that he had paid a bribe to the Deputy Collector in a case in which his son had been charged of theft before him. He was disbelieved and the Government permitted the Deputy Magistrate to prosecute the accused for defamation, but the trying Magistrate convicted him under this section. But it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section, though he might be for defamation, because, by making the statement in answer to the questions put, the accused did not intend to set the criminal law in motion. He had been compelled to appear before the District Magistrate, and what he had stated was in reply to questions put to him by the Magistrate.<sup>3</sup> The case is not unlike one in which a person on conviction urges in his petition of appeal, that the case against him was trumped up by some one in the police. So where the accused who was convicted of homicide, petitioned the Lieutenant-Governor for his release, on the ground that the accusation was a false one, got up by one S. K. from enmity, whereupon S. K. prosecuted him for making a false charge under this section, but his conviction was set aside by the Chief Court, who held that, to constitute the offence of "falsely charging a person with having committed an offence" within the meaning of this section, something more is necessary than to falsely impute against a person, that he has committed an offence.

2294. The "charge" contemplated in this section means a charge made in order to the institution of criminal proceedings.<sup>4</sup> So where the accused submitted a petition to the Deputy Commissioner, while he was on tour making enquiries into certain matters connected with the management of the Court of Wards, complaining of the manager and the subordinate staff, it was held that the petition being merely filed before him, while he was acting in his executive capacity, could not be regarded as a complaint within the meaning of s. 4 (b) of the Procedure Code. There was consequently no charge or institution of criminal proceedings, and that, while the accused might have been convicted of defamation, he could not be convicted of an offence under this section.<sup>5</sup>

2295. Exactly the same view has been taken in Calcutta<sup>6</sup> in a case in which the accused had complained to the Collector, as the Superior Officer of the Court of Wards, of a subordinate of that department having wrongfully confined him for extorting a bribe. The Collector was also the District Magistrate, and he took up the petition, judicially examined the complainant, and ordered his prosecution under this section. It was held that the Magistrate had acted arbitrarily, in turning a departmental complaint into a criminal complaint, and that even supposing for a moment that he could do so, he could not order his prosecution without giving him an opportunity of calling his evidence.<sup>1</sup> Even a complaint to a Magistrate is not a charge, unless there is an express or implied request to take judicial action, to the detriment of the person charged. For instance, there is such a thing as giving information to Magistrate, which is distinct from a charge, and is not to be confounded with it.

2296. The true test is: Did the person complaining do so with the intention and object of setting the criminal law in motion against the person complained against? Where, for instance, the accused petitioned to a Magistrate that the police who had arrested his brother, were tutoring certain persons to be witnesses against him, and that "the Court may be pleased to make inquiries to find out the truth of the above allegations and to take the necessary steps in the matter," it was held that the object of the petitioner was to prevent the further alleged tutoring of witnesses, and that his petition could not be therefore treated as a charge, so as to justify proceedings under this section.<sup>2</sup> It was so held where the accused had requested the Police Superintendent against a Sub-Inspector who was a bribe-taker.<sup>3</sup> A person who, in answer to questions put to him by a police-officer making an investigation under s. 161 of the Procedure Code, falsely mentions the name of another person as the offender, does not thereby make himself liable to a prosecution under this section.<sup>4</sup> So where the accused addressed a letter to the police in which he did not claim any personal knowledge of the facts, but on the authority of information supplied to him by others, stated that a certain person had murdered a woman, and that the petitioner could prove it, it was held that as the accused was merely stating what he had heard, and as he had no motive for preferring a false charge against the person informed against, he could not be said to have made a false charge with knowledge of its falsehood.<sup>5</sup>

2297. The mere despatch of a telegram, falsely stating that a dacoity had been committed, without mentioning the names of any persons alleged to have been concerned or suspected of complicity in the offence, does not amount to the institution of a false charge, within the meaning of this section.<sup>6</sup> One Chedi Ram, a peon, wired to the Collector, that the Naib Tahshildar, the Plague Doctor and one Razack, peon, had burst open his house, beat his family and forcibly inoculated them. The Collector sent the wire to a Magistrate who, upon an enquiry made, found the complaint false and thereupon sanctioned his prosecution under this section. But the High Court quashed the proceedings holding that as there was no complaint to a Magistrate, the complainant could not be proceeded against under this section.<sup>7</sup> A charge may be vexatious, but it is not on that account to be considered necessarily false.<sup>8</sup>

reason that a District Magistrate had referred it for the opinion of the High Court.<sup>1</sup> The policy of law in permitting compositions of certain crimes, is undoubtedly to condone the crime if the party aggrieved is so willing. Such composition may be for a valuable consideration, and composition has the effect of putting an end to the offence as if it had never happened. It would be contrary to the policy of law which permits composition, to tolerate retaliation, when it intends to bury in oblivion the principal wrong, and about the merits of which there can then be no inquiry. It would, therefore, seem that in the case of offences which may be lawfully compounded, the accused cannot, after compounding with the complainant, prosecute him for making a false charge, nor can the police or the Court in which the criminal proceeding may have been instituted.

2299. Knowledge of Falsehood Material.—The fact that the statement was made recklessly, may show that it was made in bad faith. But bad faith is evidence of malice. It is not evidence of the knowledge of falsehood. And what is required is not merely knowledge of falsehood, but also the absence of just or lawful grounds. These are essential ingredients of an offence under this section, and their significance must be appreciated. As Plowden, J., remarked in a case: “It is of great importance to the administration of justice in this country, that this section should be correctly understood and applied. Unless the person making a charge actually knows that there is no just or lawful ground for it, he is not guilty of the offence, and cannot properly be convicted of it. It is not enough to find that he had acted in bad faith, that is, without due care or inquiry, or that he has acted maliciously, or did not believe the charge to be true. The actual falsity of the charge, recklessness in acting upon information without testing it, or scrutinizing its sources, natural malice towards the person charged—these are all relevant evidence, more or less cogent, but the ultimate conclusion must be, in order to satisfy the definition of the offence, that the accused knew that there was no just or lawful ground for proceeding. It may be difficult to prove this knowledge, but however difficult it may be, it must be proved, and unless it is proved, the informer must be acquitted.”<sup>2</sup>

2300. The phrase “no just or lawful ground” would seem to be equivalent to the English phrase “without reasonable and probable cause.” Now, a reasonable and probable cause is, in the words of Hawkins, J., “an honest belief in the guilt of the accused based upon a full conviction, founded upon reasonable grounds, of the existence of a state of circumstances, which assuming them to be true, would reasonably lead any ordinarily prudent and cautious man, placed in the position of the accused, to the conclusion that the person charged was probably guilty of the crime imputed. There must be first, an honest belief of the accuser in the guilt of the accused; secondly, such belief must be based on an honest conviction of the existence of the circumstances which led the accuser to that conclusion; thirdly, such secondly mentioned belief must be based upon reasonable grounds; by this, I mean, such grounds as would lead any fairly cautious man in the defendant’s situation to believe; fourthly, the circumstances so believed and relied on by the accuser, must be such as amount to reasonable ground for belief in the guilt of the accused.”<sup>3</sup> And this is what is implied by reasonable and probable cause. Its absence is the want of reasonable and probable cause, and of just or lawful ground, the presence of which is a gravamen of the crime. It may then be that the charge made by the accused was wholly false, but if the accused believed it, he is protected, though his belief may have been mistaken.

2301. There must have been reasonable grounds for his belief. If he believed in the facts reported to him, his belief would be reasonable, though the facts reported to him may prove to be false. Of course, in such a case the question would be, had the accused reason to believe the information conveyed to him? But this is an inquiry which does not admit of much scrutiny. For the question about a man's trustworthiness, depends as much upon his position and repute as upon the relation in which he stands to another. For, there is honour even amongst thieves, and one may be a trusted and trustworthy friend of another, though he may be an abandoned villain to the rest of the world. As Lord Hatherley observed in a case: "Information given by one person of whom the party knows nothing, would be regarded very differently from information given by one whom he knows to be a sensible and trustworthy person. And the question whether or not a reasonable man would or would not act upon the information, must depend in a great degree, upon the opinion to be formed of the position and circumstances of the information, and of the amount of credit which may be due under those circumstances to the person who thus conveyed the information."<sup>1</sup>

2302. It must be remembered too that the burden of proving absence of just and lawful ground, is upon the prosecution and not on the accused. It is on it to prove affirmatively a negative fact, and for that purpose there must be clear and cogent evidence adduced in the case. It will not do to refer to the record of the former case and to come to the conclusion that that record proves the accused's guilt.<sup>2</sup> And what is to be proved is, that the accused had not just or lawful ground at the time he made the charge or instituted the proceeding. It may be that he instituted in good faith a charge, which on subsequent investigation was found to be false. But this is not for what he is criminally liable. Moreover, in judging of his conduct the Court must take into consideration his feelings and passion, the injury done to him, his education, character and trend of mental thought, his credulity whetted by the wrong done to him or which he fancies, unusually adopted, and the loose method of enquiry and want of critical insight usually displayed by men in his station of life. As has been observed in a case: "It is not enough and not a sufficient ground for charging under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code, that a person to whom a wrong has been done, or who conceives that a wrong has been done to him, makes a charge or complaint upon evidence or a statement which is not, or ought not to be sufficient to satisfy a reasonable mind. However rashly he may act in receiving and believing such statement—if in fact and truth he does not know, at the time he makes the complaint, that there are no just or lawful grounds for making complaint, he cannot be convicted of making a false charge under the above section."<sup>3</sup>

2303. A false charge may as much be made by a public servant, as it may be by a private individual. So where a head-constable sent a report to his immediate superior, that certain persons habitually received stolen property, in consequence of which they were prosecuted, it was held that the originator of the false report was as much liable to a conviction under this section as if he had himself been the actual complainant. "The criminal information was laid before the Deputy Magistrate entirely on the prisoner's representation to the Inspector. Had it not been for his reports to that official, the charge would never have been made, and the prisoner, although subordinate to all intents and purposes, was the actual and personal originator of the charge, and cannot shift the responsibility. If the mere fact of being in a subordinate position is to shield a man from the consequences of official acts originated by himself, no one will be safe from false and malicious charges."<sup>4</sup> Such a case must be distinguished from one in which the police-officer, being required to make an investigation into an offence, falsely and corruptly reports it as proved. In such a case, it cannot be properly said that he instituted or caused to be instituted any criminal proceedings or made a false charge, and he cannot therefore be convicted under this section.<sup>5</sup>

2304. Again, the false charge must relate to an offence, or the proceedings instituted must be criminal, otherwise, the accused cannot be dealt with under this section. Proceedings relating to an offence under this Code are, of course, criminal proceedings. And so are those instituted under the penal provisions of special or local laws. The words "criminal proceedings" have been understood in English Law to be a proceeding before a Magistrate which may (not that they must) end in imprisonment.<sup>1</sup> So a proceeding before a Magistrate for levy of a poor-rate by distress, and in default for commitment to jail for any term not exceeding six months, or until payment of the amount, was held to be a criminal cause or matter within the meaning of s. 47 of the Judicature Act.<sup>2</sup> The question whether a proceeding is civil or criminal has reference rather to the procedure than to the origin and nature of the liability. Indeed, there are many civil liabilities which are criminally enforceable, and in such cases the proceeding resorted to enforce them is a criminal proceeding. It is not necessary that the procedure there resorted to, must end in imprisonment. All that is necessary is that it may so end, though imprisonment may be awarded only in lieu of distress or the payment of a penalty.<sup>3</sup> So the service of notice on a person for abetting a nuisance by filling up the ashpit to abandon the privy, and build a pail closet, under the Public Health Act<sup>4</sup> is a criminal proceeding so that its disobedience would be criminal, being punishable with fine, and in default with imprisonment.<sup>5</sup> So proceedings under the Workmen's Breach of Contract Act,<sup>6</sup> for wilfully neglecting to work for the employer, compelling him to perform the work or to repay the advance are criminal, though the only relief to which the complainant is entitled is repayment of the loan or specific performance of the work, since on failure to do the one or the other at the option of the complainant, the Magistrate may imprison the recalcitrant workman with imprisonment up to three months.<sup>7</sup> But a breach of contract is not an offence within the meaning of s. 4 of the Procedure Code.<sup>8</sup>

2305. Charge Partially False.—This section contemplates a charge which is inadmissible in its nature, and therefore, what is to be considered is the nature of the complaint or charge made by the accused: in other words, whether the complaint is substantially true and what is false is a mere fringe to the complaint, or whether the substantial complaint is false and what is true is a mere fringe, or in other words, a mere accessory circumstance.<sup>9</sup> The accused in a case made a report to the police to the effect that one Bechoo had abused and assaulted him and stolen a brass badge and a chudder from his person. The police found that the charge of abuse was true, but the charges of assault and theft were false. It was held that the question whether this constituted a case substantially true, or whether it was a false case, depended upon what was the real charge preferred by the accused, and that it was a question for the consideration of the Court of first instance, and upon which the High Court declined to express an opinion.<sup>10</sup> It is, however, apparent that the addition of the false charge was made by the accused, to make the offence cognizable by the police and therefore formed a substantial part of his accusation.

2306. A person may be convicted of abetment of an offence under this section, if he had instigated another to make a false charge. Causing to be Instituted. But the question in such a case would be whether his act constitutes an abetment, or the principal offence here described. For, a person who causes a criminal proceeding to be instituted against a person, falls into the same category as one who himself institutes the criminal proceeding. At the same time, the question whether he must be treated as the principal or as an abettor must necessarily depend upon the degree of his participation in the crime. If a person makes a charge through his agent, manager or the like, he would be liable in the same way and to the same extent as if he had himself made it. On the other hand, had he merely co-operated with another he may be guilty of merely an abetment. But, of course, in order to support a charge of abetment, there must have been evidence of previous co-operation for there can be no abetment of an act after it has been committed. So a person who gave evidence in support of a false charge, could not be convicted of the abetment of that charge.<sup>1</sup> Of course, this clause is intended to apply to a case where a person complains and the criminal proceedings are then instituted by the police, in which case the question would be whether he had or had not caused the proceedings to be instituted, so as to be amenable to this section. The question, again, depends upon the nature and extent of this co-operation with the police in instituting the criminal proceeding. The mere fact that a person informs the police against a certain person, does not thereafter make him liable for anything and everything that the police may choose to do. The question whether the complainant was the real prosecutor must depend upon the degree of interest he took in the case and the extent to which he identified himself with the prosecution. If he engages counsel for the prosecution and assists the police and the official prosecutor, he cannot be heard to say that he was not the prosecutor de facto, though he may not be a prosecutor de jure.<sup>2</sup>

2307. Civil Remedy.—Of course, it is never a conditio sine qua non to the maintainability of a civil suit for damages, that there should have been a previous criminal prosecution. Consequently, a person may sue merely for damages for a false and malicious prosecution, without prosecuting him for an offence under this section.<sup>3</sup>

2308. Enhanced Sentence for Criminal Proceeding.—The first paragraph presents a normal case. The second deals with the aggravated form of the same offence. It, however, requires that in order to render a person liable for the enhanced sentence therein provided, a criminal proceeding should be instituted in consequence of the false charge. In short, it must not be a mere accusation, but some action must have been taken in consequence of it. The question what amounts to the institution of a criminal proceeding, has been the subject of some controversy (§§ 2259-2262). But even those who understand that phrase in accordance with the view of the Calcutta High Court, have to admit that that phrase does not bear the same meaning in this paragraph.<sup>4</sup> It has been contended, on the one hand, that the institution of criminal proceedings here referred to must mean their institution before a Magistrate.<sup>5</sup> On the other hand, the other view is that such proceedings need not necessarily proceed to that extent, and there is no reason why they should, in order to bring the offender within the grasp of this paragraph.<sup>6</sup>

2309. The other view was justified in the Punjab on the ground that the institution referred to in the section must refer to a judicial proceeding on a false charge and it is only in consequence of the charge being tried and found false that the law visits the offender with heavier sentences.<sup>1</sup>

2310. But this view does not combat the difficulty pointed out by Wilson, J., in the Full Bench case,<sup>2</sup> that, if the phrase be restricted to mean a criminal proceeding before a judicial tribunal, what are we to say of false proceedings instituted, say under breach of the peace<sup>3</sup> or bad behaviour<sup>4</sup> sections of the Procedure Code. The fact is that the language of the section lacks in perspicuity, and exponents of neither view stand upon sure ground. To apply the language of Mathew, J., "The difficulty of ascertaining the meaning of the Legislature upon the point, is one of a class with which the Courts are but too familiar, and is due to the fact, that the language of the enactment is neither wholly popular nor altogether technical, and is therefore not to be interpreted readily either by a lawyer or a layman."<sup>5</sup> In this case too the learned judges had to consider the meaning of the same term, and the view of the Court was that a criminal information is as much distinct from a criminal proceeding as the latter is distinguishable from a criminal prosecution. In the words of Brett, M.R., the word "proceeding" is a very different term, and one much wider than criminal "prosecution."<sup>6</sup>

2311. Intent to Cause Injury at What Time Material.—The foundation of the offence under this section is malice, and the section requires that the institution of the criminal proceeding, or the making of the false charge, must have been "with intent to cause injury"—in other words, they should have been actuated by malice. Now malice is a feeling of the mind, and its evidence can only be found in the act and conduct of the prosecutor, in the previous ill-feeling he may have towards the accused and in the nature of the charge as laid and as it was subsequently prosecuted. For, as the Privy Council observed in a case, malice may be shown at any time in the course of the enquiry.<sup>7</sup> So Cockburn, C.J., said in a case: "A prosecution, though in the outset not malicious, as having been undertaken at the dictation of a Judge or Magistrate, or, if spontaneously undertaken, from having been commenced under a bona fide belief in the guilt of the accused, may nevertheless become malicious in any of the stages through which it has to pass, if the prosecutor, having acquired positive knowledge of the innocence of the accused, perseveres mala animo in the prosecution, with the intention of procuring per nefas a conviction of the accused."<sup>8</sup>

2312. Measure of Punishment.—Though this is a serious offence and justifies the passing of a substantial term of imprisonment, there may be cases when the mere infliction of a substantial fine would satisfy the requirement of justice (§ 370). The accused, an old man of 65, had falsely charged several persons of rioting. Out of regard for his age, the Magistrate fined him Rs. 1,000, whereupon the High Court, though it refused to interfere, observed that where fine is substituted for imprisonment, it should be equally deterrent and such as would inflict the same suffering on the old delinquent as imprisonment would have inflicted on a younger man.<sup>9</sup> “ Offence ” in this section includes any act committed at any place out of British India, which, if committed in British India, would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460 ; and every such act shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty of it in British India.

Exception.—This provision shall not extend to any case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the offender.

2313. Analogous Law.—The clause defining “ offence ” in this section was added by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1894.<sup>1</sup>

2314. Harboursing escaped prisoners of war<sup>2</sup> and a deserter,<sup>3</sup> have been provided for in other sections. This is another section dealing with what was described in the original Draft Bill as “ subsequent abetment.” Such an offender will still be classed as an accessory after the fact, under English Law (§ 945).

2315. The exception in favour of husband or wife is on the lines of English Law, which, however, only exempts a feme covert from receiving her husband, the husband being liable for receiving the wife.<sup>4</sup> Both under English Law<sup>5</sup> as well as under the section, any other relationship affords no defence to a charge for harbouring.

2316. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, but warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class ; but where the principal offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year and not to ten years, then it is triable by the Court by which the offence is triable.

- (1) That an offence was committed.
- (2) That the accused harboured or concealed some person.
- (3) That the person so harboured or concealed had committed the offence.
- (4) That the accused then knew, or had reason to believe that the person harboured or concealed was the offender.
- (5) That in harbouring or concealing him, the accused intended to screen him from legal punishment.

And as an aggravating circumstance, prove—

(6) That the accused knew that the offence committed by the person so harboured or concealed was punishable with—

(a) death or

(b) transportation for life, or imprisonment which may extend to ten years.

2318. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the——day of——at——the offence of——(specify the offence) was committed at——(specify the place) by A B and that you on or about the——day of——at——harboured (or concealed) the said A B, knowing (or having reason to believe) at the time of the said harbouring (or concealing), that the said A B committed the said offence of——and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 212 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2319. Principle.—Four things are essential for the commission of an offence under this section : (i) an offence, (ii) an offender, (iii) his concealment, and (iv) criminal intention. The last presupposes knowledge of the rest. The fact that a person is an offender fleeing from justice, does not make a man amenable to this section, for giving him succour and shelter. It is his evil intention to screen him from punishment, that converts his act into an offence. But law punishes none for his evil intention, and it punishes a harbourer of an offender not so much because he harbours him, as because it helps offenders to flee from justice. Consequently, it is no offence to harbour person who are not criminals, but who merely abscond to avoid or delay a judicial investigation.

2320. Meaning of Words.—“ Whenever an offence has been committed ” : The commission of the offence must be complete. It must not be merely in fieri. “ Whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the offender,” that is, there must be some facts brought to his knowledge, from which he may infer that the person sheltered is an offender.

2321. Harboursing Offenders.—The criminal responsibility of one for aiding another, rests upon the principle that it is the duty of every good citizen to assist and not to thwart public justice, or the vengeance of the law.<sup>1</sup> The offence of harbouring—whether a deserter,<sup>2</sup> an escaped prisoner of war<sup>3</sup> or an offender—rests upon the same footing. The Court does not prohibit the extension of hospitality to strangers, but it cannot tolerate when it is made a cloak for screening fugitive offenders. So, while every man has a right to receive his relations into the bosom of his family, he has no right to receive one who makes it his hiding place, after the perpetration of crime. In this respect the liability of a relation is the same as that of a stranger. For, they are both subject to the same public duty. So it has been held in England, that if a master receives his servant, or a servant his master, or a brother his brother, they are accessories in the same manner as a stranger would be.<sup>4</sup> The only exception that the section makes is in favour of the husband or wife, and it is based upon the higher principle which sanctifies the relationship and its covenants and upon the observance of which rests the very foundation of society. In England where the system of joint family is unknown, there is no reason to except other relations, and the Code following as it does the English Law, makes no other exception, though the system of family life is different in this country, and the family ties stronger.

2322. In order to make a person liable under the section there must be, in the first place, the commission of an offence. In England it has been held that the felony must be complete at the time of the assistance given ; otherwise the assistant is not liable as an accessory. So Hawkins says : “ A man shall never be construed an accessory to a felony, in respect of the receipt of an offender, who at the time

(1) 4 Black. 38.

(2) S. 136.

(3) S. 130.

(4) 2 Hawk P. C., c. 29, s. 34.

of the receipt, was not a felon, but afterwards becomes such by matter subsequent ; as where one receives another who has wounded a person dangerously that happens to die after such receipt ; for, though the offender be for special reason adjudged to some purpose guilty of homicide ab initio, yet he shall not be so esteemed in respect of any others but himself, for fictions of law shall never be carried further than the reasons which introduce them necessarily require."<sup>1</sup> There is, of course, no distinction in this country between a felony and a misdemeanour. Both are alike offences, and a harbourer in the case supposed by Hawkins, would be guilty of harbouring an offender, causing grievous hurt, though not a murderer. As the word "offence" includes not only an offence punishable by the Code, but also an offence punishable under a special or local law with imprisonment for at least six months,<sup>2</sup> it follows that the harbouring of even such a person is deemed an offence under the Code. It is not necessary that the offence committed be cognizable or non-bailable, nor is it invariably necessary that it should be committed in British India. But in the latter case, only heinous offenders as described in the penultimate paragraph, are within the rule.

2323. Secondly, there must be harbouring or concealing the offender. These words are intended to be more precise than the English

(2) Accused must Harbour. terms "receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon."<sup>3</sup>

Now even these words have been held not to include a mere omission, as a person knows of a felony and does not discover it,<sup>4</sup> or suffer the principal to escape<sup>5</sup> or if he speak or write in order to obtain a felon's pardon or deliverance,<sup>6</sup> or advise his friends to write to the witnesses not to appear against him at the trial, and they write accordingly<sup>7</sup> or even if he himself agree for money not to give evidence against the felon.<sup>8</sup> The sort of assistance which constitutes accession must be such as helps him to escape from apprehension, as where a person assists him with a horse to ride away with,<sup>9</sup> or with money or victuals to support him in the escape, but not after he is awaiting his trial in confinement. So giving one the consolation of one's company after the deed, may amount to accession, as where the accused received a lad who had robbed a banking house where he was clerk, and where he stayed for twenty minutes, after which both proceeded by coach to Bristol and thence to Liverpool with the intention of embarking for America, where they were apprehended. It was held that this was evidence to go to the jury upon an indictment for harbouring, though the places in the coaches had been paid for by the boy.<sup>10</sup>

2324. Of course no harbouring or concealment is punishable unless there

(3) Accused must have Knowledge of the Offender. was an offence, and the accused knew that the person harboured is the offender. Without such knowledge, a person may be convicted for merely extending his hospitality to a person in distress. It is, therefore, absolutely essential that the prosecution must establish that the harbouring was done with the knowledge or belief that the person harboured had committed the offence. It is not enough that he suspects him to be an offender. It is necessary to shew that he had reason for believing him to be so. So in England, it has been held that in order to render a man guilty as an accessory, he must have notice, either express or implied, of the principal having committed a felony.<sup>11</sup>

2325. As to what facts or circumstances there were to put a man upon inquiry, must depend upon the circumstances of each case. A known offender seeking protection at an unusual hour, possessed of unusual impediments, may put a man upon inquiry. But, where guests are received at all hours, this fact alone may create no presumption. Of course, the fact that a person is an old offender does not necessarily suggest the commission of any recent crime at the time he seeks assistance. But if having obtained food and shelter he evinces fear of his apprehension by his talk or demeanour, it will be a fact to put the accused upon inquiry. Indeed, harbouring is a continuing offence, and it may be, that a person may receive another in ignorance, but afterwards he may be appraised of his offence. It is then for him to beware. For, the dawn of such knowledge is the beginning of his liability.

2326. Lastly, a person may know that he is harbouring an offender, but he may do so to prevent his escape. He is not then guilty
 (4) Intention to for harbouring him. For the crime imputable to the Screen. harbourer is the hindrance of public justice, by assisting the offender to escape the vengeance of the law.<sup>1</sup> The intention to screen him must then be apparent or proved. It cannot be presumed, unless such presumption arises from the other proved facts of the case. The intention, again, must be to screen him from legal punishment, and not merely a legal prosecution. Of course, there can be no legal punishment, unless the offender was guilty. If, therefore, he was tried and acquitted, the harbourer cannot be convicted of this offence. A person who is guilty but afterwards escapes legal punishment by turning King's evidence, is within the rule, and though he may be pardoned, his accessory may yet be condemned for screening him.

2327. Husband or Wife Excepted.—The exception in favour of the husband or wife is not necessarily restricted only to a husband or wife lawfully married. So where a woman was charged with comforting, harbouring and assisting a man who had committed a murder, and it appeared that she considered herself as his wife, and lived with him as such for years, it was held that she was entitled to be acquitted, even though the marriage was in some respects irregular and probably invalid.<sup>2</sup> But this case would not save a person who was and lived as another man's mistress.

213. Whoever accepts or attempts to obtain, or agrees to accept, any gratification for himself or any other person, or any restitution of property to himself or any other person, in consideration of his concealing an offence or of his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment,

[Offence—s. 40.

Gratification—s. 161.]

2328. Analogous Law.—This section and the next deal with what is known in English Law as compounding a felony. There can be, of course, no offence where such composition is legal under some other provision of law, as for example, s. 345

(1) 4 Black, 38.

(2) Mary Good, 1 C. & R. 185.

of the Procedure Code, which permits the compounding of certain offences. Such cases are saved by the exception to the next section. The present section punishes a person for unlawfully (i) compounding or (ii) concealing the offence or the offender.

2329. English Law.—The provisions of this and the next section correspond with those of 18 Eliz., c. 5, s. 4, which enacts that if any person “by colour or pretence of process, or without process upon colour or pretence of any matter of offence against any penal law, make any composition, or take any money, reward, or promise of reward” without the order and consent of some Court, shall suffer the sentence of such fine or imprisonment or both as to the Court shall seem proper.<sup>1</sup> This section, however, only served as a general model to the Law Commissioners who have made a notable departure in enacting the Indian rule. Under the English Statute a person may be convicted for compounding “upon colour or pretence of any matter or offence”—words which are wide enough to include not only an actual offence committed, but also any matter suspected or understood to be an offence.<sup>2</sup> But the actual commission of an offence is the first requisite of criminal liability under this section. For, as was observed by the Madras High Court, “the intention was to discourage malpractices, when offences have really been committed, or when persons really guilty are screened, and not to ensure general veracity on the part of the public, in regard to imaginary offences of offenders.”<sup>3</sup>

2330. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable exclusively by the Court of Session if the offence be capital—by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class if the offence be punishable with transportation for life or with imprisonment for ten years—by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class, or the Court by which the offence is triable if the offence is punishable with imprisonment for less than ten years.

- (1) The commission of an offence.
- (2) That the accused attempted to obtain, or agreed to accept or accepted any gratification or restitution of his property.
- (3) That he did as in (2) in consideration of his concealing an offence or for screening the offender from legal punishment or for omitting to prosecute him.<sup>4</sup>

To these may be added the following aggravating circumstances :—

- (4) That offence so compoundable is punishable with—
  - (a) death, or
  - (b) transportation for life, or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years.

2332. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the—day of—at—one A B committed the offence of—punishable with—, and that you on or about the—day of—at—attempted to obtain (or agreed to accept, or accepted) for yourself (or another person, to wit—) a certain gratification, to wit—(or certain property to wit—) in consideration of your concealing the said offence of—(or screening the said—from legal punishment for the said offence, or not proceeding against the said A B for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment); and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 213 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

2333. Principle.—The punishment of crime is as much necessary for the safety of individuals as it is necessary for the security of the State. No one can, therefore, compound an offence merely because he happens to be the person directly injured. His direct injury may be considerable, but he has also to take into account the indirect injury such offenders do to society. In cases involving only a trifling injury to society and those which do not bespeak a determined hostility to its laws, law allows the party aggrieved to compound with the offender.<sup>1</sup> But in more serious cases, it permits no such indulgence. It then regards the culprit as a menace to social well-being and as one who is a pest upon its happiness. In such cases it punishes those who make a profit out of a public wrong.

(1) The sentence originally prescribed was two hours in the pillory, but the sentence in the text was substituted by 56 Geo. III, c. 138. The 18 Eliz. was made perpetual by 27 Eliz., c. 10.

2334. Compounding an Offence.—This section punishes the unlawful compounding of a felony. It does not matter by whom the offence is compounded, whether by the person aggrieved, or by a material witness for the prosecution;<sup>2</sup> if it is compounded for a consideration, it is an offence under this section. The consideration may be either restoration of the property lost, or delivery of other property, or payment of a hush-money for that purpose. That purpose must be the (i) concealing of an offence, (ii) or screening the offender, or (iii) omitting to prosecute him. In short this is a subsidiary offence, depending upon the existence of the principal offence. If there was no such offence, then a person cannot be punished under this section though he may have intended to screen one whom he suspected to be an offender.<sup>3</sup> So where a person complained against another, who was panch, that one Ali had stolen his fishing cage and concealed it in a tank near his house, whereupon the panch went to Ali's house with the complainant, and on inquiry found the cage in the tank. They then arrested him and threatened to send him up to the police, but let him go on payment of Rs. 5, on which they were both charged for an offence under this section. But the Court held that as there was no evidence of theft by Ali the conviction of the two accused was illegal.<sup>4</sup> Where the accused had previously prosecuted one Manilal of criminal breach of trust in respect of his jewellery, whereof Manilal had been tried and acquitted, the fact that Manilal had previously restored the jewels to the complainant did not expose him to the penalties of this section, because the acquittal of Manilal the only person accused of the offence, was a final adjudication that no such offence had been committed, and which fact could not be re-agitated in a subsequent trial under this section.<sup>5</sup> In other words, the words "concealing an offence" and "screening any person from legal punishment for any offence" in this and the next section presuppose the actual commission of an offence, or the guilt of the person screened from punishment; if there was no such principal offence, a subsidiary offence under these sections cannot come into existence.

2335. Of course, the existence of consideration is the chief ingredient of the offence. If a person forgives another out of the generosity of his heart for a non-compoundable offence committed against him, he could not be punished under this section, though he may, in doing so, conceal the offence or screen the offender.

214. Whoever gives or causes, or offers or agrees to give or cause, any gratification to any person, or to restore or cause the restoration of any property to any person, in consideration of that person's concealing an offence, or of his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment, shall if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description, provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—The provisions of sections 213 and 214 do not extend to any case in which the offence may lawfully be compounded.

[Offence—s. 125.

Gratification—s. 145.]

2336. Analogous Law.—As originally enacted, this section contained the following exception, and illustrations:—

“Exception.—The provisions of sections 213 and 214 do not extend to any case in which the offence consists only of an act irrespective of the intention of the offender, and for which act the person injured may bring civil action.”

Illustrations.

“(a) A assaults B with intent to commit murder. Here, as the offence does not consist of the assault only irrespective of the intention to commit murder, it does not fall within the exception, and cannot therefore be compounded.

“(b) A assaults B. Here, as the offence consists simply of the act, irrespective of the intention of the offender, and as B may have a civil action for the assault, it is within the exception, and may be compounded.

“(c) A commits the offence of bigamy. Here, as the offence is not the subject of civil action, it cannot be compounded.

“(d) B commits the offence of adultery with a married woman. The offence may be compounded.”

2337. Both the exception and explanations were repealed in 1882, the former by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act, 1882,<sup>2</sup> which substituted the present exception, and the latter by the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882.<sup>3</sup> Under the exception as originally framed, two conditions must have co-existed before it could operate, namely, (a) the immateriality of the offender's intention, accompanying the act constituting the offence, and (b) the maintainability of a civil action by the person injured.

2338. The first purposed the division of all offences into two classes of acts in which the presence of criminal intention was, or was not stated to be necessary to constitute an offence. Hence offences in the description of which the words “voluntarily,” “intentionally,” “fraudulently,” “dishonestly,” or the like, expressly entered, were not compoundable. This eliminated a large class of offences, as, for instance, those contained in Chapters VIII and XIII, that is, offences against the public tranquillity and those relating to the weights and measures. The remaining offences must have answered the second test, the language of which was certainly not clear. For the words “may bring a civil action” could not have referred to all cases in which such action was possible, but only to those in which it was substituted as a mode of relief instead of a criminal prosecution. This was, again, an enunciation of a rule, the right interpretation of which depended upon the technical forms of English law, under which, it has been an established principle in cases of serious crimes by which personal injury is sustained, not to permit civil redress for the private wrong unless the criminal law is first set in motion. The exception was thus not one easy of interpretation, and the illustrations appended were misleading, and as remarked by West, J., “they so far from throwing light on its meaning, created the chief difficulties in its construction.”<sup>4</sup> The combined effect of the two was to make grievous hurt<sup>5</sup> and defamation, non-compoundable.<sup>6</sup>

2339. The amendments of 1882 were made in deference to the views of West, J., in the case decided in 1876.<sup>7</sup> The deletion of the illustration has eliminated the conflicting element noticed in that case, and the substitution of the present exception has simplified the determination of cases in which law permits the compounding of offences for a valuable consideration. These offences are now those mentioned in s. 345 of the Procedure Code, which refers to offences made punishable by the following sections of the Code : ss. 298, 323, 334, 341, 342, 352, 355, 358, 374, 426, 427, 447, 448, 490, 491, 492, 497, 498, 500, 501, 502, 504 and 506. Besides these, there are five other offences punishable under sections 324, 325, 335, 337 and 338 of the Code, in which the offence may be compounded with the permission of the Court before which any prosecution of such offence is pending. And the last clause of s. 345 adds : " No offence shall be compounded except as provided by this section."

2340. Procedure and Practice.—An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and where the offence screened is capital, it is triable exclusively by the Court of Session, but if it is punishable with transportation for life or with imprisonment for ten years, then by either the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class, and in any other case, by the Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class, or the Court by which the offence is triable.

- (1) The commission of an offence.
- (2) That the accused offered or gave or caused or agreed to give any consideration or restitution of his property.
- (3) That he did as in (2) in consideration of the others concealing an offence, or for screening the offender from legal punishment, or for omitting to prosecute the accused.

To which may be added the following fact in aggravation :—

- (4) That the offence so compounded is punishable with—
  - (a) death, or
  - (b) transportation for life, or with imprisonment which may extend to 10 years.

2342. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

" I (name of office of Magistrate etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

" That on or about the—day of—at—, you offered (or caused, or gave, or agreed to give or cause) a gratification, to wit—, to C D in consideration of the said C D's concealing the offence of—under s.—of—and which offence is punishable with death [in the Court of—C D's or of his screening you (or any person)] from legal punishment for the said offence of—[or of his screening you (or any person) from legal punishment for the said (or any) offence or of his not proceeding against you (or any person, to wit—) for the purpose of bringing you (or him) to legal punishment], and thereby committed an offence under s. 214 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2343. Principle.—It has been observed before, that for purposes of procedure, offences are variously sub-divided, as, for example, they have been divided into warrant or summons cases, cognizable or non-cognizable, bailable, or non-bailable, compoundable or non-compoundable. The last division affects not so much the procedure as the principle which regards crime as an offence against society, and therefore one the prevention, no less than the punishment of which, is a concern of the State. The views taken, however, at different times and under different influences, of the inequity of particular wrongs, vary widely ; and there are wrongs which, while they fall within the same general description, may, according to circumstances, be of an extremely pernicious, or of but a slightly pernicious tendency. They may endanger the welfare of society, or they may affect, except in some inappreciable degree only the interest of an individual.

2344. Hence there comes to be recognized a class of cases which may be the subject of private composition. If the person injured desires to obtain compensation, the law does not forbid him ; if he invokes the penal interposition of the Magistrate, that interposition is not refused.<sup>1</sup> Full competence to accept satisfaction for wrongs done to oneself follows necessarily from the general rule of freedom of transactions. That rule however, and the deductions therefrom are subject to limitation in the interest of the community, in consequence of which some compromises of offences are made penal, and others are so disapproved that the Court will not give effect to them. The last section and this are intended to prevent the suppression of prosecutions in which the public is deemed to be deeply interested in the punishment of the offender. For this purpose, the Procedure Code enacts that no prosecution shall abate in spite of its compromise, if it was unauthorized by s. 345 of the Procedure Code, and these sections provide punishments of both parties to it.

2345. Meaning of Words.—“In consideration of.....concealing an offence”: The concealment and suppression must be of an offence—that is to say, some offence must have been committed. Where a person has been tried and acquitted of an offence, of which there is no possibility for another to have committed (e.g., criminal breach of trust) the foundation for this offence and that described in the last section fails, it being no longer open to the Court to retry that question, in a prosecution under this section.<sup>2</sup> “Screening any person from legal punishment for any offence”: There can be no legal punishment for an offence, unless it was committed.

2346. Accused's Liability for Illegal Compromise.—This section is intended to punish the giver as the last is intended to punish the receiver of anything, in consideration of compromising a non-compoundable offence. The two sections are, thus, the counterparts of each other, and deal with all parties, who are likely to be concerned in the illegal composition of an offence. Thus, then in the first place there must be an offence committed, for the intention of the legislature was to suppress malpractices, when offences have really been committed or when persons really guilty are screened and not to ensure general veracity on the part of the public, in regard to imaginary offences or offenders.<sup>3</sup> So where one Saminatha agreed to give Rs. 10 to a witness, in consideration of his not giving evidence against one Kolundavelu who stood charged with the offence of house-breaking by night and theft in a building, but the witness refused the offer and gave evidence against Kolundavelu, but who was nevertheless acquitted, whereupon Saminatha was prosecuted under this section, the Court held that Kolundavelu's acquittal had left no offence, upon which Saminatha's conviction under this section could be supported.<sup>4</sup> If the accused had committed an offence, it would seem to be immaterial if he knew or believed it. Indeed, a person committing a serious offence, cannot be heard to say that he had acted in ignorance. The only excuses admissible in his case are those given in the general exceptions, and in which case he is as good as if he had committed no offence at all.

2347. Any Giver Liable.—It would have been sufficient if the “whoever” referred to as the tempter had been the actual offender. But the section is more general, and would apply equally to whoever gives or offers gratification for the compromise of a case. In such a case the question may arise. Suppose A commits a non-compoundable offence and B in ignorance of A's crime, but anxious to protect him against exposure, offers gratification for the compromise of his case, and which in consequence is compromised. Is B liable for compounding A's offence, though he was in fact ignorant of it? Clearly not, because B had not in his mind the hindering of justice which is the gist of the offence, and he could not be convicted, for what may have been no more than a friendly mediation. As the giver may be the accused or a stranger, so the receiver need not be necessarily the complainant of the party aggrieved. He may be, for instance, the Court trying him, in which case the offer of such gratification will be illegal, and the offence thereby committed will be the giving of a bribe which is punishable under section 261 of the Code. The case may then present a choice of sections, under which the accused may be punished. So where two of the accused had offered a gratification to a public servant, the consideration for his screening them by not proceeding against them and against the other accused, whose books and papers he had seized for the purpose of bringing them to legal punishment, it was held that the appropriate section applicable to the case was this and not 164/109 of the Code.<sup>1</sup>

2348. It is next necessary that the accused should have given, caused, or offered or agreed to give or cause any gratification to any person. The word "gratification" is here used in its generic sense as signifying anything that appeals to one's senses, whether it be a thing having monetary value or not (s. 161). The accused may give or offer such gratification or agree to give it to him. The word "agree" involves the idea of something of the nature of a demand,<sup>2</sup> but whether there has or has not been a demand is immaterial, for if the accused did not agree to give because there was no demand, he may have offered to give, and which may be unsolicited. In fact, the manner in which the gratification is arranged for is immaterial, because what the Court is concerned with is not how it was negotiated, but if it entered into the transaction, and if it did the result is the same whether it was volunteered or not.

2349. Motive Material.—Thirdly, it is necessary that the object of the gratification tendered or made should be to compromise some offence which is not legally compoundable. Such compromise may be given effect to by "concealing" it from public notice, or by "screening" the offender from legal punishment, or by omitting to prosecute him as required by law. The offence is complete as soon as the gratification is offered and it is then immaterial whether the consideration is executed or not. The fact that the accused is nevertheless prosecuted, does not minimize the offence, though it may be a fact established to disprove payment if it is denied. As to what constitutes concealment and screening, need not perhaps be set out in detail. Any act which is conducive to the prevention of the punishment of the accused, would be construed as a step in concealing the offence, or screening the offender. In this respect, concealment may as much consist of suppressio veri as of suggestio falsi. The subornation of witnesses and denial of facts by them, which are material to establish the case for the prosecution, the withdrawal of witnesses and keeping them out of the way, all fall within the mischief of the rule.

2350. Lastly, the complainant may take the Court into confidence and suggest the dismissal of the case which he is unable to compound. The Court has, of course, no power to sanction such withdrawal nor has the complainant or his pleader any power to withdraw from the prosecution, which is a power only conferred on a government servant appointed or permitted to prosecute a case.<sup>3</sup> A Court permitting an illegal withdrawal is, of course, not guilty of the abetment of this offence, but its procedure is nevertheless void, though it is sometimes condoned. But these are hard cases which proverbially make bad law.

2351. Offences Lawfully Compoundable.—Neither this section nor the last has any application to cases referred to in exception.

Exception.

In such cases the acceptance of consideration is both legal as it is a matter of course. Indeed, the very fact that law allows such offences to be compounded, suggests that the person against whom the offence has been committed, has received some gratification to act as an inducement for his desiring to abstain from a prosecution.<sup>4</sup> The composition of a compoundable offence has the effect of an acquittal of the accused.<sup>5</sup> The Court has then no jurisdiction to try it, and the accused may claim his acquittal as a matter of right. But, for that purpose, the party relying on a compromise must establish it if it is denied, and it is then for the Court to decide, whether the arrangement or composition made amounts to a composition, and whether it was deliberately arrived at, free from the influence of every kind, and when the parties were fully aware of their respective rights. So where an ignorant coolie stranger to the land had been prevailed upon to sign a composition in favour of a European of some education, and it was written in Bengali language which he did not understand, and it had been, moreover, arrived at with the assistance of the police, it was held that the composition was not binding on the complainant and that the Magistrate was consequently not ousted of his jurisdiction over the case.<sup>1</sup>

2352. In one case the accused, in breach of the Forest Rules, worked two saw-pits, instead of only one for which he had a license, and when detected by the Forester, he offered him Rs. 5 for not proceeding further with the case. He was convicted under this section, but on revision his conviction was quashed, on the ground that the amount must be taken to have been offered for compounding the offence, though to a person who had no authority to compound it.<sup>2</sup>

215. Whoever takes or agrees or consents to take any gratification under pretence or on account of helping any person to recover any moveable property of which he shall have been deprived by any offence punishable under this Code, shall, unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

2353. Analogous Law.—This section is drawn in accordance with English Law, which enacts as follows<sup>3</sup> :—

“ S. 101. Whoever shall corruptly take any money or reward directly or indirectly, under pretence, or upon account of helping any person to any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, which shall by any felony or misdemeanour have been stolen, taken, obtained, extorted, embezzled, converted, or disposed of as in this Act, before mentioned, shall, unless he shall have used all due diligence to cause the offender to be brought to trial for the same be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude not exceeding seven years, or to be imprisoned, and if a male under the age of 18 years, with or without whipping.

“ S. 102. Any person advertising a reward for the return of property stolen or lost, and using any words purporting that no questions will be asked, or that a reward will be given for property stolen or lost without seizing or making any inquiry after the person producing such property or promising to return to any pawnbroker or other person who may have brought or advanced money upon any property stolen or lost, the money so paid or advanced or any other sum of money or reward for the return of such property, or any person printing or publishing such advertisement shall forfeit pounds 50 to be recovered by action of debt.”<sup>4</sup>

2354. Under this Statute it has been held that it is not necessary to show that the accused had any connection with the commission of the offence. All that is necessary is that he had some corrupt and improper design when he received the money, and did not bona fide intend to use such means as he could for the detection and punishment of the offender.<sup>4</sup> So where A was charged with corruptly and feloniously receiving from B money, under pretence of helping him to recover his stolen property, and with not causing the thieves to be apprehended, three questions were left to the jury :—

- (1) Did A mean to screen the guilty parties, or to share the money with them?
- (2) Did A know the thieves and intend to assist them in getting rid of the property by promising B to buy it?
- (3) Did A know the thieves, and assisted as her agent, and at her request, in endeavouring to purchase the stolen property from them, not meaning to bringing the thieves to justice?

(3) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 101.

(4) King, 1 Cox. 36.

2355. The jury answered the first two questions in the negative and the third in the affirmative. It was held that the receipt of the money under the above circumstances was a corrupt receiving of the money by A within the Statute.<sup>1</sup>

2356. It is needless to add that in closely following the wording of the English Statute, this section intends to extend its provisions to this country. It may be added that the Code contains no provision corresponding to section 102 of the English statute already reproduced, but persons offending against that section would be punishable for abetment of the offence punishable under this section.

2357. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency or a First Class Magistrate. As this section applies to a person other than the principal offender (§ 2361), a conviction in the alternative of this offence and s. 379 or s. 411 is bad.<sup>2</sup>

- (1) That a person was deprived of some property by an offence committed under the Code,<sup>3</sup> which must be independently proved,<sup>4</sup> though the offender may not have been convicted.
- (2) That the accused took, agreed or consented to take, some gratification.
- (3) That he did so under pretence or on account of helping some person to recover such property.
- (4) That he failed to use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence.<sup>5</sup>

2359. Principle.—This section protects a bona fide detective, but it reprobates one who is in league with thieves and holds stolen property up to ransom. There is nothing dishonest or criminal in receiving gratifications as a recompense for honest work done to recover the property and to trace out the thief. But the offence begins the moment there is any attempt at screening the thief, though there may have been an honest attempt made in recovering the property. This follows the policy of law that it is from the public stand-point as important that the thief should be punished as that the property stolen should be found. And one who achieves one purpose without the other, is guilty of a public wrong, not only because he fails in his duty, but because in doing so he probably compromises with the thief.

2359-A. Meaning of Words.—“Takes or agrees or consents to take” : This does not apply to a mere demand of a gratification, but it applies to the acceptance of an offer. “Under pretence or on account of helping any person” : There is pretence when a person promises to help another without intending to help him. In any other case, there may be no pretence, but nevertheless no effort to secure the offender. “He uses all means in his power,” which must depend upon the circumstances of each case.

If, therefore, there was a demand of a larger sum for the return of stolen property, and the owner offered a smaller sum, which the former refused, it could not be said that there was any agreement or consent to take the gratification. But would this constitute an attempt within the meaning of section 511 of the Code? In the opinion of the Allahabad Court "an attempt to take a gratification..... necessarily includes the idea of a concurrence of wills between the giver and taker, with this much superadded thereto that some act was being done preliminary to the act of taking. In other words, an attempt is a stage in the commission of the offence which is intermediate between the agreement or consent and the actual taking."<sup>1</sup>

2361. In this view a negotiation which falls through, as in the case last supposed, would not even amount to an attempt within the meaning of section 511. But this view has been controverted by the Chief Court of Lower Burmah in a case arising out of identical facts. There one A had lost his buffalo and it was found by B who had also lost his cattle. Four or five days after, A asked B to return it, but B demanded Rs. 40; A offered Rs. 20 which B declined to take. B knew that the buffalo was stolen and belonged to A and he was thereupon prosecuted under this section, and the question was whether he could be convicted for an attempt under section 215 read with s. 511 of the Code. The Chief Court held, dissenting from the Allahabad case,<sup>2</sup> that the facts were sufficient to constitute an attempt. Bigge, J., observed that the question may be considered in the following manner:—

2362. Section 2 of the Indian Contract Act<sup>3</sup> defines what is a proposal and how far it is distinguishable from a contract. "When one person signifies to another his willingness to do or to abstain from doing anything with a view to obtaining the assent of that other to such act or abstinence, he is said to make a proposal."<sup>4</sup> The assent of a proposal amounts to a promise.<sup>5</sup> In the words of Bigge, J., "proposals as above defined which are inseparable from the establishment of contractual arrangements, are attempts to complete an agreement, or in other words, to arrive at the mutually expressed view of two wills whereby the legal bond called a contract is constituted.....The learned judge who decided the Allahabad case has.....failed to appreciate the distinction as regards an agreement to take, and I am of opinion that when once a proposal has been made for the payment of an illegal gratification, whether it fructifies into an agreement or not, the offence of an attempt to commit an offence under section 215 is complete."<sup>6</sup>

2363. This case, however, took no note of another essential requirement of the offence, namely, that the accused is only punishable if he does not use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence. In other words, the mere opening of the negotiations to sell the stolen property would only amount to an attempt, if it can be shown that the accused had no intention to detect the offender, and that it was the expressed or implied term of the proposal. But how is this to be proved? In ordinary cases where the accused is shown to be in league with the thief, this may be presumed, but where he disputes that the property offered is stolen, and offers it for sale as his own, he could not be convicted of this offence, merely because the property was shown to be stolen, and the accused had charged for it. Such a transaction could not amount to the taking of a gratification on account of helping any person to recover it. The accused must not then lay a claim to the property, but must only profess to charge a remuneration for discovering it, or as a price of its delivery.

2364. Legal Reward.—This section merely prohibits the acceptance of reward for restoration of goods of which the owner has been deprived "by any offence punishable under this Code." Consequently, when no such offence is proved, the acceptance of reward cannot be penalized under this section. Such was the case of the accused who was found in possession of the complainant's cow which he had lost from the grazing ground. Accused took Rs. 12 from the complainant for its return which he subsequently refused. He was convicted of this offence but his conviction was quashed on the ground that the complainant had failed to prove that in depriving the complainant of his cow the accused had committed any Code offence.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, where the buffaloes of one S were stolen, which the accused agreed to find if he was paid money and promised to say nothing about the payment and took no steps to trace the thieves, he was rightly convicted of an attempt to commit this offence as he was attempting to hold the owner's lost cattle up to ransom.<sup>2</sup>

216. Whenever any person convicted of or charged with an offence, being in lawful custody for that offence, escapes from such custody, or whenever a public servant, in the exercise of the lawful powers of such public servant orders a certain person to be apprehended for an offence, whoever, knowing of such escape or order for apprehension, harbours or conceals that person with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended, shall be punished in the manner following, that is to say, if the offence for which the person was in custody or is ordered to be apprehended is punishable with death, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if the offence is punishable with transportation for life, or imprisonment for ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, with or without fine, and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year and not to ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for such offence, or with fine, or with both.

“Offence” in this section includes also any act or omission of which a person is alleged to have been guilty out of British India, which, if he had been guilty of it in British India, would have been punishable as an offence and for which he is, under any law relating to extradition, or under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881,<sup>3</sup> or otherwise, liable to be apprehended or detained in custody in British India; and every such act or omission shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty of it in British India.

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the person to be apprehended.

2365. Analogous Law.—The explanation of the term “offence” was inserted by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1886.<sup>4</sup> This section extends the provision of section 212 which applies only to harbouring an offender, who after the commission of an offence, absconds before his conviction. This section extends the same provisions to an offender escaping from lawful custody.

2366. Procedure and Practice.—The offence falling under this section is cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable as follows :—

If the offence be capital or is punishable with transportation for life, or with imprisonment for ten years.	}	By the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate, 1st class.

If it is punishable with imprisonment for one year, and not for ten years.	}	By the Presidency Magistrate, Magistrate, 1st class, or the Court by which the offence is triable.

- (1) That some person was charged with or convicted of an offence.
- (2) That he was in custody for the same.
- (3) That his custody was legal.<sup>1</sup>
- (4) That he escaped from it.
- (5) That the accused knew of such escape.<sup>2</sup>
- (6) That with such knowledge he harboured or concealed such offender
- (7) That he harboured or concealed him with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended.<sup>3</sup>

Or instead prove the following points:—

- (1) That a person had been ordered to be apprehended.
- (2) That such order was by a public servant.
- (3) That it was in the exercise of the lawful power of such public servant.
- (4) That the accused knew of such order for apprehension.<sup>4</sup>
- (5) That with such knowledge he harboured or concealed such offender.
- (6) That he did so with the intention to prevent him from being apprehended.<sup>5</sup>

In either case the following may be proved as aggravating circumstances :—

- (i) That the offence for which the person was in custody, or was ordered to be apprehended, was punishable with death; or
- (ii) That it was punishable with transportation for life, or imprisonment for ten years.

2367-A. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——, at——one A B was charged with or convicted of an offence under section——by the Court of——[and which offence is punishable with death, (or with transportation for life, or imprisonment for ten years)] [or one A B was ordered to be apprehended for an offence to wit——by——a public servant in the exercise of his lawful powers as such public servant) and that you knowing of the escape of the said A B from such custody (or knowing of the said order for apprehension)] on or about the——day of——at——harboured or concealed the said A B with the intention of preventing the said A B from being apprehended, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 216 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2368. Principle.—This is but an aggravated form of the offence dealt with in section 212. There the offender escapes to avoid his possible arrest. Here he escapes from an arrest, or at any rate, after his arrest has been ordered. In the one case, he was hiding to avoid a contingency, here he hid himself to avoid a fact. As such, law deems it an aggravated offence, and for which this section provides a comparatively heavier sentence.

2369. Meaning of Words.—"Harbours.....such person" : "Harbours" means shelters, protects, or offers food<sup>6</sup> or asylum to the offender.<sup>7</sup> It is said that the term "harbour" in this section should be construed liberally, so that even a friendly visitor might be so punished.<sup>1</sup> But there is no justification for this view (§ 2372). "Is punishable with death" : This is merely descriptive of the offence and has no reference to the offender who may or may not have been already punished,<sup>2</sup> or may have been acquitted.<sup>3</sup>

2370. Harboursing an Escaped Offender.—Whether an offender escapes to avoid his possible apprehension, or whether he escapes after his apprehension is ordered, the offence is in its nature the same,—though the fact that in the one case that law had made no movement against him, makes a difference as regards the degree of his crime. A person who absconds to avoid his certain arrest has certainly to be distinguished from one who absconds before his arrest is ordered. In the former case, he is really guilty of evasion of the process of law, and this section consequently visits him with its heavier penalties. Between him and one who breaks jail, law makes no distinction as regards his accessory, for, in either case the result is the same—hindrance of justice by his intervention. But merely harbouring such an offender is neither an offence under this section, or section 212, for the essence of criminality lies in the intention to prevent his apprehension. The existence of this intention must be affirmatively proved by the prosecution, and if it cannot be proved the accused cannot be convicted, though he may have harboured a dacoit, knowing him to be a dacoit.<sup>4</sup>

2371. It is said that the word "harbour" in this section must be liberally construed, so that even one who pays frequent friendly visits to an escaped convict might be convicted of this offence.<sup>5</sup> In this case one A, a convicted robber, had escaped from jail and hid himself in the house of B. His friend C used to pay him frequent visits, whereupon his conviction under this section was held to be justified. But it is submitted that there is no justification for construing a word describing an essential ingredient of a highly criminal offence liberally, and unless there is evidence of offering shelter, protection or asylum to the offender, a mere visitor cannot be held guilty of this offence. The essence of this offence lies in harbouring a man with the object of preventing his apprehension,<sup>6</sup> which must be strictly proved.

2372. This section contemplates the offender as escaping during three stages of his prosecution : (i) after his apprehension is ordered by a public servant in the exercise of his legal power ; (ii) after he has been charged ; and (iii) after he has been convicted. Like several other sections, this section does not state whether the offender would have been guilty of an offence, but inasmuch as it adopts the phraseology of section 212, it would probably be held that the harbourer cannot be punished, unless the person harboured is shown to have committed an offence (§ 2333).

2373. But, of course, this is only a legitimate inference, though it is by no means justified by the express provisions of the section. Assuming, however, this to be established, the section requires that a definite order must have been passed for his arrest by public servant in the exercise of his lawful powers, as such public servant. Such order may be passed by a police-officer or by a Magistrate, but in either case it must be in the exercise of his legal powers. There is some difference between the legal exercise of his powers, and the exercise of his legal powers. In the one case, not only must the order be within jurisdiction, but it must also be legal as an order. In the other case, the order itself may be illegal, though it must be within jurisdiction. The question has been considered elsewhere (s. 438), and it will probably suffice, to state here, that the phrase is here used in the former sense, as implying both jurisdiction as well as legality of the warrant. It is not necessary that there should have been made any attempt to serve the process, or that the accused should have been aware of it. If it is recorded, it is sufficient, though the accused may not have been apprehended and charged with the offence. The word "charge" here must not be understood to mean the formulation of a charge after recording evidence under Chapter XIX of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It rather means a formal accusation made in Court, that a certain person has, or is reasonably suspected to have committed an offence. This section could scarcely apply to an offence while it is under investigation.

2374. The case of an offender escaping from lawful custody presents no difficulty, for the question of custody is one of fact and the question of its legality must depend upon the authority for his arrest. If his arrest was illegal, his harbourer could no more be punished, than he could himself be punished for escaping from it. The word "legal" has, of course, been used in contradiction to "illegal" defined in s. 43 (§ 328). The rest of the section uses terms, for the meaning of which reference must be made to the commentary under s. 212.

216-A. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that any person are about to commit or have recently committed robbery or dacoity, harbours them or any of them, with the intention of facilitating the commission of such robbery or dacoity, or of screening them or any of them from punishment, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Penalty for harbouring robbers or dacoits.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section it is immaterial whether the robbery or dacoity is intended to be committed, or has been committed, within or without British India.

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is by the husband or wife of the offender.

[Reason to believe—s. 26. Harbours—s. 216-B. Robbery—s. 391. Dacoity—s. 391.]

2375. Analogous Law.—This section is new, and was inserted by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1894.<sup>1</sup> It is evidently intended to cut off robbers and dacoits from all assistance in their nefarious mission (§ 2381).

2377. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That certain persons had recently committed, or were about to commit robbery or dacoity.
- (2) That the accused knew or had reason to believe it.
- (3) That he harboured all or any of such persons.
- (4) That he did so with the intention of—
  - (a) facilitating the commission of such robbery or dacoity; or
  - (b) screening them or any of them from punishment.

2378. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

"That you —on or about the—day of—knew (or having reason to believe) that A B was about to commit robbery (or dacoity) [or that he had recently, that is to say, on or about the—day of—committed robbery (or dacoity) in—] harboured him with the intention of facilitating the commission of robbery (or dacoity) by the said A B [or (in the case of robbery or dacoity already committed add) of screening him from punishment]; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 216-A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of Court of Session).

2379. Principle.—This section deals with the special case of robbers and dacoits or would be robbers and dacoits. The harbouring of those who have already committed such offences would be as much punishable under this section as it is under the more general provisions of section 212. But this section is then, of course, the more appropriate, not only because it is special section applicable to the case, but also because it indicates the intention of the Legislature that such offenders should be awarded the enhanced punishment here provided.

2380. The explanation and exception here follow the analogy of the corresponding provisions of sections 212 and 216.

2381. Meaning of Words.—“Facilitating the commission” refers to persons about to commit robbery or dacoity. “Screening them..... from punishment” refers to those who have recently committed those offences.

2382. Harboursing Robbers.—This is a special section applicable to persons harbouring robbers and dacoits and thereby affording them facilities for the commission of those crimes, or screening them from punishment after their commission. In order to render a person liable to the penalties of this section, the mental attitude of the accused towards the principal offender must be (i) that he must know or have reason to believe, and (ii) his intention must be to facilitate or screen. There must not be merely knowledge or intention, for they must be both present.<sup>1</sup> That knowledge or intention must relate to the commission of robbery or dacoity; and those offences must be either (iii) about to be committed, or (iv) must have been recently committed. So far as regards a harbourer before the fact, he must know that the person whom he is harbouring is about to commit robbery, and his intention in harbouring him must be to afford him facility for the commission of robbery. Of course, if no robbery is committed, his harbouring would come to nothing, for the section does not punish two wicked men for their wicked intentions. If there was an attempt, the case is, of course, different. But in this connexion the distinction between a mere preparation and an attempt has to be kept in view (§ 970).

2383. Then again the facility offered may not have actually facilitated the commission of the crime owing to unforeseen circumstances, but it must be such as would under ordinary circumstances facilitate its commission. The facility here spoken of must be some direct aid in the direction of the crime. A person who feeds a hungry tramp, whom he believes to be a notorious footpad, may facilitate the commission of the crime which he afterwards commits, but, it is neither harbouring, nor is the harbouring with the intention of facilitating his crime, nor indeed, can it be said to facilitate it. But the providing of food and shelter to a person about to commit robbery, would be such an offence. So if he is provided with a horse to ride, or a weapon to rob with, or, indeed, any assistance which makes the commission of the offence easier for that help—it is sufficient. But the robber must be then about to commit the offence. This means that the robbery must have been already planned and be imminent. The fact that one provides a robber shelter to study the situation, which he avails himself of sometime afterwards, would not condemn the former to the penalties of this section. The time between the accused's act and the deed must be such as to lead the Court to a reasonable inference that the harbouring and the robbery were both a part of the same plan. For, the harbourer is, in such a case, fully an abettor though he is punishable under this section as an independent offender. The same remarks apply to the harbouring of persons who have recently committed robbery. This is the case of subsequent abetment, or to use the term of English Law, accession after the fact (§ 945). In either case the requirements of this section are mutatis mutandis the same. In the one case there is facility given to commit the offence. In the other case there is facility given to escape apprehension.

216-B. In sections 212, 216 and 216-A, the word “harbour” includes the supplying a person with shelter, food, drink, money, clothes, arms, ammunition or means of conveyance, or the assisting a person in any way to evade apprehension.

Definition of “harbour” in sections 212, 216 and 216-A.

(1) Sakharam, (1895) B. U. C. 775 (no facts reported).

2384. Analogous Law.—This section is merely explanatory of ss. 212, 216 and 216-A which refer to the harbouring of offenders. It was added by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1894<sup>1</sup> to define the sense of “harbour” as used in those sections. The definition is in accordance with English Law under which an accessory after the fact is defined to be one who, knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon.<sup>2</sup> A person who assists another with food, drink, shelter, money, clothes, arms, ammunition or means of conveyance may harbour a person within the meaning of sections 212, 216 and 216-A, but such harbouring is not an offence, unless it is accompanied by criminal knowledge and intention. In such a case, even assisting a person would be harbouring him. For example, the harbouring spoken of in section 216-A, may be with the intention of facilitating the commission of an offence, in which case assisting one to evade apprehension is not necessary. Where, however, any assistance is rendered after the commission of an offence, it must have been to enable the offender to evade his apprehension. Such assistance may consist of any act done, or omitted to be done, which has for its object the protection of the offender from apprehension.

2385. According to Blair, J., the words “or assisting a person in any way to evade apprehension” must be meant to point to some method ejusdem generis with those that have been specified in the section. So where the police, being informed that a dacoit by name Subba had visited the accused and others, and was at that moment in their company, proceeded to arrest him. At that time Subba, the accused and others were sitting near a well. They saw the police approach whereupon Subba withdrew and hid himself in an adjoining sugarcane field. The police inquired from the accused as to who the man was who had just left them, and he swore that it was not Subba, who was, however, afterwards arrested in the field. The accused was prosecuted for harbouring a dacoit under section 216 of the Code, and the question was whether the false statement made by the accused, constituted such assistance as is here defined. But Blair, J., having read the words ejusdem generis held that it did not.<sup>3</sup>

2386. It is submitted that this view is unsound and has been dissented from in Calcutta, where the words have been held to be words of general enlargement and should not be read ejusdem generis with supplies of food or of other necessary articles. In this case the offender lived with his undivided brother. The police ordered the accused to produce him for which he went inside, soon afterwards returning with the officer's son, whom he said he had mistaken for his brother. The Police searched the house and found the offender concealed therein. He was held rightly convicted of this offence.<sup>4</sup> The same view was taken in another case, where the accused had warned a proclaimed offender of the approach of the police and had done his best to assist him to make good his escape.<sup>5</sup>

217. imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

2387. Analogous Law.—This section belongs to the class of offences dealing with the duty of public servants towards the public. As such, this and the next three sections should have formed part of Chapter IX, for they relate to offences by public servants. All the four sections (ss. 217-220) refer to disobedience by public servants, its nature determining the applicability of the several sections. This section deals with official partiality, involving disobedience of any direction of law. The next section punishes the incorrect preparation of record, while sections 219 and 220 deal with judicial vagaries, resulting in the passing of illegal orders or making illegal commitments.

2388. Procedure and Practice.—In a case falling under section 197 of the Procedure Code, no prosecution can be instituted under this section without sanction, as thereby provided. An offence under this section is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That the accused is a public servant.
- (2) That there was a direction of law as to the way in which he was to conduct himself.
- (3) That he disobeyed that direction of law.
- (4) That he disobeyed it knowingly.
- (5) That such disobedience was in the conduct of himself as such public servant.
- (6) That he did so intending thereby to save or knowing to be likely that he would thereby (a) save any person from legal punishment, or (b) subject him to less punishment than what he is legally liable, or (c) save any property from forfeiture, or (d) any charge to which it is liable by law.

2390. Charge.—The accused has a right to know exactly the direction of law for the violation of which he is charged. It should, therefore, be distinctly set out in the charge,<sup>1</sup> which should run thus:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“That on or about the——day of——at——you were a public servant, and, as such, you then knowingly disobeyed the direction of the law as to the way in which you were to conduct yourself as such public servant, to wit——(here specify the direction of law disobeyed) intending thereby to save——(or, knowing it to be likely that you will thereby save) from legal punishment [ (or subject him to a less punishment than that to which he was liable) or (in the case of property, add) with intent to save or knowing that you were likely thereby to save some property, to wit——from forfeiture (or any charge to which it is liable by law) ], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 217 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

2391. Principle.—Public servants are, in the discharge of their official duties, entrusted with large powers which they are enjoined to exercise in a certain way and subject to certain rules. So long as the exercise of those powers are within those limits, the public servant is out of the reach of criminal law. But the moment he transgresses them, his action becomes illegal, and it may then be a question whether it is so on purpose or through ignorance. In the former case if it is due to a mere official perversity unconnected with favouritism or partiality, he may yet escape clutches of criminal law, however illegal his action might be. But if that perversity was on purpose, and the purpose was to save some one from legal punishment or any property from forfeiture or charge, then the public servant has subordinated his public office to a private end, and as such, he is liable under this section. Of course, his act may not be the outcome of corruption or malice, but may even be due to benevolence, but that makes no difference, for law expects every public servant to do his duty, and while it condones many irregularities and even some illegalities, it cannot uphold unrighteous act in defiance of the law.

2392. Meaning of Words.—“Disobeys any direction of law.” The direction of law here means express provision of law<sup>1</sup> or of rules or regulations having the force of law.<sup>2</sup> “Intending thereby to save”: That intention need not be corrupt or malicious. It may arise from a mistaken belief as to that person's liability to “legal punishment.” “Save any person from legal punishment”: Legal punishment here means a judicial sentence, and not merely a departmental punishment.<sup>3</sup> “Or any charge to which it is liable by law”: The charge includes a mortgage, as well as a charge properly so called.

2393. Intentional Disobedience by Public Servant.—This section punishes a wilful and intentional disobedience of a direction of law, when the disobedience was wilful and was intended to screen a person from legal punishment, or some property from forfeiture or a charge to which it was liable. In the first place, disobedience must be “knowingly” which excludes all cases of ignorance or mistake. Then there must have been disobedience of any direction of law, and it must prescribe the way in which the public servant was to conduct himself. The direction of law must, obviously, be an express direction, and not merely one which imposes the more general obligation on every subject, not to stifle a criminal charge. Such a direction is to be found in sections 44 and 45 of the Procedure Code.<sup>4</sup>

2394. By “law” is here meant positive or statute law or some rules or regulations which are declared by or under statute to have the force of law.<sup>5</sup> Where such law creates an obligation, it must be strictly construed. For instance, section 45 of the Procedure Code creates a legal obligation upon village accountants and those engaged in the collection of the public revenue, to supply to the police certain information relating to the commission of certain offences including theft. Therefore, the accused who was merely a village accountant and village munsiff's peon, could not be convicted under this section for hushing up a case of theft committed in their village.<sup>6</sup>

2395. The direction must then not only be express and positive, but it must also be one which applies to a person in connection with the act, the legality of which is questioned. His disobedience must then be directed to a certain purpose—that purpose being to save a person from legal punishment or a property from forfeiture or a charge. If that was his intention the offence is complete, and it is not then further necessary to show that in point of fact the person so intended to be saved had committed an offence, or was justly liable to legal punishment. It is immaterial for the purpose of this section, that the intention which he had for saving a person from legal punishment, was founded upon a mistaken belief as to that person's liability to punishment.<sup>7</sup>

2396. So where the accused, a police-officer in charge of a police-station, induced the complainant who had come to report against one Adhari of cutting off his ear, to compromise the case, and the complainant having died of the injuries so received, the police-officer was prosecuted both under this and the next section in that he had failed to take down the complaint and had compromised the case. Adhari was also committed for the murder of the complainant, but he was acquitted, and the accused thereupon contended that, after Adhari's acquittal, it was not possible to say that he had saved him from legal punishment, but it was held that that fact was immaterial so long as the intention was clear, and as there was this evidence against him, his conviction was upheld.<sup>1</sup> The same view had been previously taken in another case of the same Court<sup>2</sup> in which it was laid down that in such case the real issue to be tried is not whether such alleged offenders were in fact guilty or not, but merely the belief and intention of the prisoner in respect of their guilt.<sup>3</sup>

2397. The intention of the accused at the time of the disobedience is Intention Material. material. It must be to save a person from legal punishment, or a property from forfeiture or charge. Where the intention was neither, the accused could not be convicted under this section. The preparation of a false diary by a police-officer investigating into a case suppressing therefrom facts unfavourable to the accused, is an example of an intentional disobedience, intended to save a person from legal punishment.<sup>4</sup> But his tying up a number of persons apprehended at night time, on suspicion that they had committed culpable homicide, and keeping them in the village in which they had been arrested, instead of at once taking them to the nearest police-station, the object being to wait until it is more convenient to start, would be a disobedience shorn of the intention required to make it criminal under this section.<sup>5</sup> Such was held to be the case of an old and illiterate Police Patel who, on receiving a complaint of rape against two persons, made some investigation, arrested the accused and sent them off to the Police Station House, but on the way the relatives of the girl came to a settlement with the accused, and requested the Patel to drop the proceedings whereupon he tore up the Panchnama. It was held that the Patel had not torn up the Panchnama with any intention of saving any person from legal punishment.<sup>6</sup>

2398. The words "to save any property from forfeiture or any charge" are sufficiently wide to embrace the case of a police constable who retains for himself a piece of gold found in the course of a search, and fails to report it to his superior officers.<sup>7</sup>

218. Whoever, being a public servant, and being as such public servant, charged with the preparation of any record or other writing, frames that record or writing in a manner which he knows to be incorrect, with intent to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, loss or injury to the public or to any person, or with intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment, or with intent to save, or knowing that he is likely thereby to save, any property from forfeiture or other charge to which it is liable by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

2399. Analogous Law.—This section punishes the intentional preparation of a false record—the intention being to cause loss or injury to any person or the public.

2400. Procedure and Practice.—In cases falling under section 197 of the Procedure Code, no prosecution can be instituted under this section without sanction as therein provided. This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

2401. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused framed a record or writing.
- (2) That he framed it incorrectly.
- (3) That he was then a public servant.
- (4) And as such he was charged with its preparation.
- (5) That in framing an incorrect record, the accused intended—
  - (a) to cause loss or injury to any person or the public, or that he knew such loss or injury to be likely, or
  - (b) he intended to save or knew that it was likely to save some person from legal punishment, or
  - (c) any property from forfeiture or charge.

2402. Charge.—The word “charged” in this section is not restricted to the narrow meaning of “enjoined by a special provision of law.”<sup>1</sup> It is not, therefore, necessary to particularize the law under which the public servant was enjoined the duty of preparing the record. The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the—day of—you—being then a public servant and being as such charged with the preparation of a record to wit—(or a writing to wit—) framed the said record (or writing) in a manner which you knew to be incorrect, in that it contained an incorrect statement, to wit—(here specify the incorrect statement) and which you made with intent to cause, (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause) loss (or injury) to the public [ (or to any person to wit—) or with intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby save any person from legal punishment, or with intent to save or knowing that you are thereby likely to save any property, to wit—from forfeiture to which it was liable by order of the Court in Case No.—of—(or other charge to which it was liable by law that is to say—(mention why it was so liable) ], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 218 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

2403. Principle.—The section deals with the intentional falsification of an official record by a public servant with the object of saving or injuring any person or property. The Court presumes that all judicial and official acts are regularly performed, and it is in the highest degree necessary that this presumption attaching to public records, should be in consonance with fact. Their correctness, is, therefore, insured in two ways, by legal sanction and departmental punishment. The intervention of the former becomes only necessary when the incorrectness is intended to cause loss or injury to some member of the public or the public generally. Without such intention criminal law is not concerned with the punishment of official misconduct.

2404. Meaning of Words.—“Record or other writing” : A paysheet drawn in the Railway office to show the sums due to coolies is such a record.<sup>2</sup>

2405. Falsification of Record.—Public servants amenable to this section, are only those who are “charged” with the preparation of any record or writing. Such persons need not necessarily be enjoined to prepare it by a special provision of law.<sup>3</sup> Nor should the duty be within the ordinary legitimate scope of their duty. But all the same, it must have been their duty to prepare it. Persons who are mere custodians of public records are not charged with their preparation, so that a falsification by them cannot be punished under this section. So where the record-keeper of a Municipality was called upon to produce a certain document placed in his custody, and finding it missing, he fabricated another, and produced it as the genuine document in Court, his offence was held not to fall under this section as he was only the custodian of the record which it was not his duty to prepare, and the fabrication was not intended to cause loss or injury, but only to screen himself from punishment. It was, however, held that such a case might be conceivably met by section 192.<sup>4</sup> The same view was taken in Madras in the case of a Village Munsiff who had submitted a false calendar in which he purported to have convicted certain persons of theft.<sup>1</sup>

2406. The fact that one public servant assists another in the preparation of a record, does not necessarily make him liable if he makes it falsely, though in such a case, he may be held liable for abetment of the other, if it was the latter's duty to prepare it. And in such a case the former may be held guilty of abetment, though the latter may be wholly innocent of the offence.<sup>2</sup> The mere preparation of a false record is not then an offence punishable under this section. To be punishable it must not only be false but so made with the intention of causing gain or loss to the public, or any person, or save any property from forfeiture or other charge. So where a Police Inspector was charged with having falsely entered in his diary that certain cartmen told him that "they were not beaten by dacoits," it was held that this was not of itself sufficient for a conviction under this section; but where, without endeavouring to inquire into the truth of the entry in his diary, he destroyed certain records which falsified it, and substituted fresh note books, his bona fides were open to question and he must be deemed to have framed an incorrect public record intentionally.<sup>3</sup>

2407. It is not necessary that the incorrect document should be submitted to another person, or be otherwise used by the writer. The requirements of the section are satisfied as soon as the document is shown to have been prepared by a public servant charged with its preparation, in a manner which he knows to be incorrect, and with the knowledge that he is thereby likely to cause loss to the public.<sup>4</sup> If after such preparation he uses that document, he may be guilty of another offence, but the fact that he used it for a certain purpose and failed, does not make his offence under this section any the less complete. If, for example, he first prepared a false statement and then used it to procure credit for payment of more than, to his own knowledge, is due to him, all the attempts to cheat in its simple<sup>5</sup> or aggravated form,<sup>6</sup> would be present; but it does not follow that, because there was not a complete attempt to cheat, there was no complete offence under this section.<sup>7</sup>

2408. Remote Injury.—The loss or injury intended must, however, be caused by the document itself or by some transaction with which it is essentially connected. The loss must so naturally flow from the record, that the Court may justifiably infer that it was the cause of its falsification. As was remarked by West and Nanabhai, JJ., the accused must not be convicted on a remote and speculative chain of possibilities, otherwise the most innocent acts might, by the exercise of a little ingenuity, be perverted into initial steps of great crimes.<sup>8</sup> So where the only evidence adduced against the accused was that he had prepared false work bills in which he had transposed some men's work from certain days to other days, it was held that though the record was incorrect, it was not by itself sufficient to convict him under this section for after the falsification, the question of criminal intention still remained, and it could not be presumed from the mere fact that in some conceivable contingencies, the error might be used along with other circumstances, to the detriment of the public.<sup>9</sup> So where a chowkidar was charged under this section, with having made a false entry in a chowkidary attendance book, with a view to support a charge which was made against a Sub-Inspector, of having made a false report regarding the length of absence from duty of another chowkidar, and thereby to cause loss or injury to the Sub-Inspector, it was held that the intention was too remote to fall within this section.<sup>10</sup>

2409. But, so far as regards the injury to the public, there is scarcely any standard by which its remoteness can be judged. For example, take the case of the Police Officer in charge of a station-house, who falsifies a first information of a heinous crime, such as a dacoity, by recording it as a report of a common theft, his sole object being to keep the information of such a heinous crime from his superior officer, the Police Superintendent. That the falsification of such a record was injurious to the public cannot be denied; but, at the same time, it could not be predicated that the particular falsification had caused any such injury, or was proximately likely to cause it. Still, the accused was convicted, because the concealment of such crimes was injurious to the public.<sup>1</sup> This case illustrates the difference between the intention and knowledge of likelihood as applied to such transactions. In the case last supposed, the intention of the accused was merely to present a clean record, but he knew that it was likely to cause injury to the public. But if suppose that in that case the accused had correctly taken down the facts as reported to him, but only registered it as a case of theft instead of one of dacoity, then, there would probably have been no case for a conviction, for, the recording of a false opinion may be an error of judgment, but it does not amount to the preparation of a false record, which is the gist of the crime.

2410. The distinction between a false statement of fact and an expression of incorrect opinion, is well marked and the section only deals with the former, and not with the latter. For, while people differ in their honest convictions, there can be no room for difference, when the record is of a statement made, and which the public servant concerned is to faithfully and fully record. Here again, if the obligation be merely to record a memorandum of the statement made by another, it might be difficult to prove that it was incorrect, unless the record made is materially different to the statement made. This may be illustrated by comparing the provisions of sections 154 and 155 of the Procedure Code. In the case of an information relating to a cognizable case, it is the duty of the police-officer to take it down, to read it over to the informant, who is then required to subscribe to it. In the case of a report of a non-cognizable offence, all that he is required to do is to enter the substance of such information. But in either case, if the police-officer frames the first information in such a way as to save a person from legal punishment, he is equally guilty under this section. For instance, if the report was that A assaulted the complainant and the police-officer records it as an assault by B, or takes down the statements of witnesses examined by him so as to exonerate A, his offence would fall within this section, though his diary may be privileged.<sup>2</sup> So, a Kulkarni in Bombay, whose duty it was to submit a report of offences committed in his village, was held to have brought himself within the terms of this section, by making first a report that one Barkia had committed an offence, and then submitting another report which was untrue and was calculated to make the charge appear untrue.<sup>3</sup>

2411. "Any Person."—The words "any person" referred to in the section need not necessarily be another person. For, it may well be the accused himself. So where a police-officer who had suppressed a document entrusted to him to forward to his superior officer, made a false entry in his official diary that the document had been so forwarded, intending that, if he were prosecuted under the Police Act for suppressing the document, he could use such entry as evidence on his behalf that he had so forwarded the document, it was erroneously held that the offence of the accused did not fall within this section, inasmuch as the false entry was made not to shield another but himself from punishment.<sup>4</sup> No reason was given for maintaining this view which is clearly untenable, and it was afterwards overruled by the Court which observed that there was no justification for reading the word "other" between "any person" in the section.<sup>1</sup> The word "person" is used in its generic sense as meaning not only an individual, but also a juridical personage, such as a corporation, company or Government.<sup>2</sup> So the preparation of a false travelling allowance bill by a public servant, would thus amount to an offence, because, the loss thereby intended is to the Government.<sup>3</sup>

2412. Injury Immaterial.—It is not necessary that the falsification should in fact cause loss or injury. As remarked before, the offence is complete the moment the falsification is made. Other things may rest in intention, but so long as they are, there the offence is complete. So again, in the case of saving a person from legal punishment, it is not necessary that the person intended to be so saved should be in fact guilty, though it is necessarily material and essential that the accused must then believe or have reason to believe him, to be guilty.<sup>4</sup> It is only then that he can be said to save any person from legal punishment. If, therefore, his intention was not save but to incriminate him, he could not be convicted under this section whatever other offence he may then be guilty of. Such was the case of a cattlepound moharrir who having sold a mare to the complainant, made a false entry to extort from him a bribe.<sup>5</sup>

2413. Intention to Save from Legal Punishment.—The intention, again, must be to save a person from legal punishment, which again postulates a belief on the part of the accused, that the person saved was so liable, and that his record will have the effect of saving him therefrom. As observed under the last section, the term "legal punishment" means only a judicial sentence, as distinguished from a mere departmental punishment.<sup>6</sup> If that was the only risk a person was likely to run, it could not be said that in framing a false record the intention of the accused was to save him from legal punishment. Of course in such a case other considerations may arise, for, the section is not confined only to the saving of persons from legal punishment and the misconduct of the accused may be injurious to the public, or again, it may save any property from forfeiture, or a legal charge. If, for instance, a person described a certain property liable to forfeiture as "ancestral" of the condemned convict, whereas it was self-acquired, it might be inferred that the object was to save it from seizure in execution of the sentence. So where it is liable to any other charge, the offence may be complete if the falsification is known to be likely to exonerate it. An attachment of property by an execution-creditor may be said to create a "charge" within the meaning of this section, though, of course, it does not create any charge within the sense now assigned to that term.<sup>7</sup> If therefore a bailiff falsely reports that the property so attached was non-existent, he would be guilty of an offence under this section.

219. Whoever, being a public servant, corruptly or maliciously makes or pronounces in any stage of a judicial proceeding, any report, order, verdict or decision which he knows to be contrary to law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

the one case ending in any report, order, verdict or decision, the other, in an order for commitment or confinement. Indeed, as such, this section really embraces all the cases that could arise under the next section, for the word "order" is comprehensive enough to include such cases as have been expressly provided for under the next section. But, there is this difference between them, that while this section relate only to a judicial proceeding, the next section is more general as regards the persons subject to it, though it is more limited as regards the iniquities thereby made punishable.

2415. Procedure and Practice.—A case falling under section 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would require sanction, otherwise no sanction is necessary. The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

- (1) That the accused was a public servant.
- (2) That he was in any stage of a judicial proceeding.
- (3) That, as such, he made any report, order, verdict or decision.
- (4) That he did so corruptly or maliciously.
- (5) That the report, order, verdict or decision was contrary to law.
- (6) That the accused was then aware of it.

2417. Principle.—This and the next section deal with judicial and executive vagaries in which the public servant prostitutes his office to private spite or gain. The essence of the crime is not that the order is illegal, but that it was made "corruptly or maliciously." But the fact that it was so made is not alone sufficient, for in the one case, the accused may be guilty of receiving a bribe and in the other case malice is immaterial if his order is right. His order must then have been made not only corruptly or maliciously, but it must be also illegal—and he must be aware of it.

2418. Meaning of "Corruptly" and "Maliciously".—The word "corruptly" is easily understood. It means an order induced by illegal gratification. But the word "maliciously" has to be defined, for it has nowhere been explained in the Code. The term, however, is of common application in Criminal Law and means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse.<sup>1</sup> So the term is used in the case of "malicious prosecution." It does not mean in law, as does in common parlance, any spite or ill-will against a person. All it means here is an illegal act done perversely, and to the knowledge of the accused. So Littledale, J., said: "Malice in its legal sense denotes a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse."<sup>2</sup> "The legal import of this term," said Best, J., "differs from its acceptation in ordinary conversation. It is not, as in ordinary speech, only an expression of hatred and ill-will to an individual, but means any wicked or mischievous intention of the mind. Thus in the crime of murder, which is always stated in the indictment to be committed with malice aforethought, it is not necessary in support of such indictment to show that the prisoner had any enmity to the deceased; nor would proof of absence of ill-will furnish the accused with any defence when it is proved that the act of killing was intentional and done without any justifiable cause."<sup>3</sup> "He that doth a cruel act voluntarily, doth it malice prepense."<sup>4</sup> "I have always thought," said Blackburn, J., "a man acts maliciously when he wilfully does that which he knows will injure another in person or property."<sup>5</sup>

2419. In a case, the prisoner with the intention of causing terror to person having a theatre, put out the gas on a staircase and placed an iron bar across a doorway, in consequence of which several persons were injured. It was held that he was rightly convicted of unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous hurt upon two of the crowd who had been so injured. "He acted," said Lord Coleridge, C.J., "unlawfully and maliciously, not that he had any personal malice against the particular individuals injured, but in the sense of doing an unlawful act calculated to injury, and by which others were in fact injured."<sup>1</sup> To which Stephen, J., added: "If the prisoner did that which he did as a mere piece of foolish mischief unlawfully and without excuse, he did it 'wilfully,' that is 'maliciously' within the meaning of the Statute."<sup>2</sup> Accordingly, the word "maliciously" when applied to the doing of an illegal act means nothing more than that it was done wilfully or intentionally.

2420. This is the sense in which the term has been understood by the Bombay High Court<sup>3</sup> who said: "Given the unlawful character of the confinement, it would be for the defendant to prove the justification or excuse; and failing that, the law would imply that he had acted maliciously or with criminal intent, so that whether his purse or his liberty were in peril, unless the defendant could establish, as a matter of fact, reasonable and probable cause, he would stand condemned as a matter of law of an illegal confinement. Mr. Murphy has ruled that the penal enactment under consideration<sup>4</sup> contemplates some wilful excess of authority; in other words, a guilty knowledge superadded to an illegal act; and in coming to this conclusion we think that he has rightly interpreted the intention of the Legislature;<sup>5</sup> whether or no that knowledge exists, must be inferred from the circumstances of each case. It is a question of fact, and not of law.<sup>6</sup> Malice must then be proved—it cannot be presumed."<sup>7</sup>

220. Whoever being in any office which gives him legal authority to commit persons for trial or to confinement, or to keep persons in confinement, corruptly or maliciously commits any person for trial or confinement, or keeps any person in confinement, in the exercise of that authority, knowing that in so doing he is acting contrary to law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

2421. Analogous Law.—This section is really a continuation of the last and refers to the same wilful excess of authority, though it is more general in its applicability to any person in lawful authority, whether he is or is not a judicial officer. His liability is, however, more limited, for it does not extend to any "report, order, verdict or decision" but is confined only to an illegal commitment and confinement. It would have unduly strained the legitimate exercise of discretionary powers, necessarily vested in executive officers, if they were exposed to the same risk of a criminal prosecution as judicial officers whose duties and responsibilities are different.

2422. Procedure and Practice.—In cases to which section 197 of the Procedure Code applies, no prosecution can be instituted under this section, without the previous sanction of Government as therein required. The offence is, therefore, non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

- (1) That the accused held some office.
- (2) That as such, he had legal authority to (a) keep persons in confinement, (b) to commit persons to confinement, or (c) to commit persons for trial.

(7) Ib. This is the difference between express and implied malice. The one must be proved as a matter of fact, the other may be presumed and is a matter of legal inference.

- (3) That he confined or committed a person as in (2) in exercise of such authority.
- (4) That he did so corruptly or maliciously.
- (5) That his act was contrary to law.
- (6) That he was then aware of it.

2424. Principle.—This section is primarily intended to check executive abuses in illegally confining and committing innocent persons, who may have resisted their being made victims to their cupidity or oppression. It will be noticed that the language of this section, though in some respects similar to that of the last section, differs from it as regards the acts in respect of which a person in legal authority is liable to a criminal prosecution under this section. This is intentional and well justified (§ 2421). For the rest, the two sections have the same object in view, namely, suppression by punishment of abuse of authority.

2425. Criminal Confinement.—The essential element of an offence under this section, consists in the malicious or corrupt intention of the official. There must be either corruption or malice, superadded to which there must be knowledge of the illegality of the confinement or commitment. Proof of an unlawful commitment to confinement will not of itself warrant the legal inference of malice.<sup>1</sup> For, as has been before observed (§§ 2418-2420), malice in law implies knowledge of illegality, and there must be evidence not only that the act was illegal but that at that time known to be illegal to the accused, or as it is put in the section, “knowing that in so doing he was acting contrary to law.” If, therefore, the act itself was legal, there can then be no question of malice, for, whatever may have been the accused’s intention he could not then be punished for what was legal.

2426. This section only applies to persons “in office” and not to those who may otherwise possess legal authority to confine or commit for confinement. For instance, the Procedure Code has in certain cases conferred such power on private persons.<sup>2</sup> They do not thereby become amenable to the penalties of this section if they abuse their power.

2427. The word “commit” here means making over to a Court for trial. The Police possess such power, as also the power to keep in or commit persons to confinement.

221. Whoever, being a public servant, legally bound as such public servant to apprehend or to keep in confinement any person charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence, intentionally omits to apprehend such person, or intentionally suffers such person to escape, or intentionally aids such person in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement, shall be punished as follows, that is to say—

[Public servant—s. 21.

Offence—s. 40.

Legally bound—s. 43.]

2428. Analogous Law.—This and the next two sections deal with the omission to apprehend, and negligent escape of offenders. This section refers to criminal omission to apprehend one so liable, the next section refers to the same omission in relation to a convicted person, while section 223 refers not to an omission in apprehension, but to a negligent escape, while section 224 punishes the prisoner himself for escaping from custody. All these offences have the same object in view, namely, the prevention of escape of an offender from justice.

2429. Procedure and Practice.—Previous sanction for a prosecution under this section is necessary in a case falling under section 197 of the Procedure Code. The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and if the offence charged with is a capital offence, the accused is exclusively triable by the Court of Session; if it is punishable with transportation for life or imprisonment for ten years—then it is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class—in any other case, the accused may be tried by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That a person was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for an offence.
- (2) That the accused was a public servant.
- (3) That as such he was legally bound to apprehend, or confine the persons as in (1).
- (4) That accused (a) omitted to apprehend, or (b) suffered him to escape, or (c) aided him in escaping or attempting to escape.
- (5) That he did so intentionally.

To which may be proved the following aggravating facts :—

- (6) That the person confined or to be apprehended was charged with or liable to be apprehended was an offence punishable—
  - (a) with death; or
  - (b) with transportation for life or imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years.

2431. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you——on or about the——day of——at——, being——(state the office held) and as such a public servant legally bound to apprehend (or keep in confinement) one——who was charged with an offence to wit——(or liable to be apprehended for an offence to wit——) intentionally omitted to apprehend him (or intentionally suffered him to escape, or intentionally aided such person in escaping, or attempting to escape from such confinement); and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 221 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2432. Principle.—Three degrees of criminal liability are contemplated by this section, depending on the nature of the offence of the principal offender, as well as on the degree of the accused's participation in the crime. The former alone are recognized as affecting the quantum of punishment, but it is evident that the latter are no less important in determining it. For, there is undoubtedly a marked difference between a mere omission and an intentional aid, while the intermediate stage by sufferance is no less distinguishable from the other two. In any case, however, there must be intention, otherwise there is no offence, whether the escape be due to aid, sufferance or omission.

2433. Intentionally Aiding, Suffering or Omitting to Apprehend or Escape.—This section applies to two classes of persons: (a) those who have yet to be arrested, and (b) those who have already been arrested. In the former case the section punishes for intentional omission to apprehend, in the latter case, the section applies when the accused intentionally suffers or aids him to escape. There can, of course, be no omission in the latter case, such omission as there may be being spoken of as “ suffering ” and which implies the idea of not opposing the escape and which may be due to carelessness or negligence, but not to consent. Where escape is by consent there is then aiding his escape.

2434. In order to render the accused criminally liable whether for intentional omission, aid or sufferance, there must be in the first place the legal obligation to apprehend or confine another. When there is no legal obligation, no omission can be criminal. The question whether a person was or was not under a legal obligation, depends upon the consideration of other laws which create and define such obligations. For instance, certain persons, including a village watchman, are required by the Procedure Code to report to the police the commission of certain cognizable offences including murder.<sup>1</sup> Such persons are not then bound to apprehend such persons and their omission to apprehend them is not therefore punishable under this section.<sup>2</sup> So while a private person may arrest any person who, in his view, commits a non-bailable and cognizable offence or who has been proclaimed as an offender,<sup>3</sup> it is a power which does not create any legal obligation, so that the omission to exercise it cannot be punished under this section.

2435. As to what amounts to intentional omission, the question is one of fact, and depends upon the circumstances of each case. It has been held in the Punjab that, on a proper case being made out under this section, the accused should be punished under this section, though his offence may also fall under section 29 of the Police Act,<sup>4</sup> the provisions of which are more general, extending as they do to "any violation of duty or wilful breach or neglect of any rule or regulation or lawful order made by competent authority." Of course, if an act does not fall within the terms of this section then it will have to be dealt with under the Police Act.

222. Whoever, being a public servant, legally bound as such public servant to apprehend or to keep in confinement any person under sentence of a Court of Justice for any offence, or lawfully committed to custody, intentionally omits to apprehend such person, or intentionally suffers such person to escape, or intentionally aids such person in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement, shall be punished as follows, that is to say :—

with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, is under sentence of death ; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended is subject, by a sentence of a Court of Justice, or by virtue of a commutation of such sentence, to transportation for life or penal servitude for life, or to transportation or penal servitude or imprisonment for a term of ten years or upwards ; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, is subject, by a sentence of a Court of justice, to imprisonment for a term not extending to ten years, or if the person was lawfully committed to custody.

to custody" in the first paragraph, and "or if the person was lawfully committed to custody" at the end of the section. As originally worded, this section applied only to a person lawfully convicted of an offence;—or a person lawfully committed to custody<sup>1</sup> being then punishable under the last section. The latter is, however, now in consequence of the amendment liable to the enhanced punishment here provided (§ 2436).

2437. Procedure and Practice.—In a case falling under section 197 of the Procedure Code, sanction is necessary for a prosecution under this section. The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. If the omission was to apprehend an offender under the sentence of death or transportation for life or for imprisonment for ten years or upwards, the offence is non-bailable, otherwise it is bailable. In either case it is, however, non-compoundable, and as regards trial, where the offence is non-bailable it is exclusively triable by the Court of Session, otherwise, it is also triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

- (1) That the accused was a public servant,
- (2) That, as such, he was legally bound,
- (3) To apprehend or keep in confinement,
- (4) Some other person who was under sentence of a Court of Justice, or had been lawfully committed to custody.
- (5) That that sentence was for some offence.
- (6) That the accused omitted to apprehend him, or intentionally suffered him to escape, or intentionally aided him in escaping, or attempting to escape.<sup>2</sup>

To which may be added the following aggravating facts :—

- (7) That the person who ought to have been apprehended was—
  - (a) under sentence of death, or
  - (b) under sentence of transportation for life or imprisonment for ten years.

2439. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

" I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

" That you—on or about the—day of—were—(state the office) and as such a public servant legally bound to apprehend (or keep in confinement) one A B, a person under the sentence of—of the Court of—for the offence of—under section—of the Indian Penal Code (or who had been lawfully committed to custody by—) intentionally omitted to apprehend the same A B (or intentionally suffered the said A B to escape, or intentionally aided the said A B in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 222 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2440. Principle.—This is only an aggravated form of the offence made punishable under the last section, the aggravation consisting in the fact that the person to be apprehended, had already been convicted or committed for an offence: otherwise the two sections are exactly identical.

2441. Leaving out of consideration the common elements which this section presents with the last, the only points that call for notice here are (i) was the principal offender under the sentence of Court? or (ii) was he lawfully committed to custody? If this is proved, the criminality of the accused then depends upon his intentional omission, sufferance or aid in the other's escape. It will be noted that the section enjoins on a public servant the duty to confine any person under the sentence of a Court. Such sentence may or may not be legal, but his liability to confine him remains the same. Of course, his obligation rests on the sentence remaining unreversed. As soon as it is reversed or modified, he is then bound to shape his course accordingly. A jailor no less than a policeman would be guilty of wrongful confinement, if he detains a prisoner one moment after his sentence is reversed or has expired. He is then no longer under sentence of a Court. In the case of unconvicted offenders, law takes a still more lenient view of the keeper's responsibilities. For, they are only liable for suffering, or permitting the escape of a person who was lawfully committed to custody. This does not mean that he incurs no liability whatever, for suffering a person not committed to custody to escape, for his liability under the last section still remains. In such cases, the questions that arise are—(a) was the person escaping liable to be apprehended for an offence? (b) was he charged with an offence? and (c) had he been lawfully committed into custody? The first two cases are punishable under the last section, while the last case is punishable under this section.

223. Whoever, being a public servant legally bound as such public servant to keep in confinement any person charged with or convicted of any offence or lawfully committed to custody, negligently suffers such person to escape from confinement, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Offence—s. 40.

Legally bound—s. 43.]

2442. Analogous Law.—This section like the last has been amended, and by the same Act,<sup>1</sup> the words added being the same.

2443. Procedure and Practice.—In cases falling under section 197 of the Procedure Code, sanction is necessary for a prosecution under this section. The offence is non-cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That the accused was a public servant.
- (2) That as such he was legally bound to keep in confinement any person who was—
  - (a) charged with, or
  - (b) convicted of any offence, or
  - (c) who was lawfully committed to custody.
- (3) That he suffered such person to escape.
- (4) That the escape was due to his negligence.

2445. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That you—on or about the—day of—were—(state the office) and as such a public servant legally bound to keep in confinement one A B who was charged with the offence of—under section—of the Indian Penal Code (or convicted of, or lawfully committed to custody) negligently suffered the said A B to escape from confinement, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 223 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

2446. Principle.—This section is supplementary to the last two sections, which deal with intentional omission, whereas this section deals only with negligence. Such a case may arise where a sentry kept to guard a prisoner, falls asleep and the prisoner escapes from his custody. This section only applies to persons arrested under a criminal process, those arrested under the civil process being punishable under s. 225-A.<sup>2</sup>

2447. Negligent Escape from Custody.—This section deals with negligently suffering the escape of a person : (a) lawfully committed to custody; (b) confined as charged with an offence; (c) confined as convicted of any offence; and the question may arise what did the Legislature imply by this verbal variation especially in the first two cases. The case of a person convicted of an offence is, of course, simple and presents no difficulty. But what did the Legislature mean by “ lawfully committed to custody? ” It would seem that in these sections the terms “ confinement ” and “ custody ” have been used in the same sense, though

(1) Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (XXVII of 1870) s. 8, by which the words “ or committed into custody ” were added.

(2) Tafaullah, 12 C. 190.

probably regarded from different points of view.<sup>1</sup> But a person charged with an offence is necessarily different from one lawfully committed to custody. The latter may be confined, and yet not charged with any offence, as, for instance, if he is committed under section 109 or 110 of the Procedure Code.<sup>2</sup>

2448. Again, the section is only confined to persons actually confined, and not to those who are still at large. And the liability attaches for negligently suffering escape from confinement. Now a prisoner cannot be said to have escaped from confinement until he has regained his liberty. The fact that the prisoner had escaped from one enclosure into another preliminary to escape, does not expose the jailor to the penalties of this section. So where the accused were keeping guard on certain cells in a jail where certain condemned prisoners were confined, and when they were relieved it transpired that the prisoners in their charge had escaped from their cells and were found crouching on their roofs where they were recaptured. It was held that, as the prisoners had not "escaped" within the meaning of this section, the guard could not be convicted.<sup>3</sup>

2449. The word "confinement" does not, however, mean merely incarceration, or imprisonment within circumscribed limits. A prisoner on the march is as confined as one secured within the four walls of the prison-house. As much as has been before observed in sections 220-225, the Legislature appears to have used the words "confinement" and "custody" as co-extensive.<sup>4</sup> But, whether there is confinement or custody, the accused cannot be convicted under this section, unless it is shown that he was legally bound to confine the person, for whose escape he is held liable.

2450. In order to create a legal obligation it is not enough that the accused should have been authorized to confine another. It is essential that such authorization should be legal. For example, a village policeman in the Bombay Presidency is nowhere authorized to take charge of convicted persons; where, therefore, a convicted prisoner escaped from the custody of a village policeman, it was held that he was not guilty of this offence.<sup>5</sup> So while there may be the general authority to confine, it may be inapplicable to a particular case. Such will be the case where the arrest of the prisoner was illegal and made without jurisdiction. The accused, in a case, was a resident of Kot Kapura in the Faridkot State. The police of that State suspected him of having committed an offence in that state, and of having escaped into British territory. The State Police thereupon sent a note to the British Police of Ferozepur District, to arrest the accused, and a British constable arrested and made him over to a constable of the Faridkot State. The latter took him into custody; while in such custody and when a British constable was present to assist the State constable, the accused made good his escape, and the question was whether his custody was lawful; but it was held that it was not, because unless he was extradited, he could not be arrested by the State police, and there was no evidence to shew that he was a British subject so that the British Police could not arrest him.<sup>6</sup>

2451. But there is a tendency in the Courts to construe a magisterial order as one within his jurisdiction. If it is so, the fact that it was irregular or erroneous does not affect the liability of the accused. So where while an Assistant Magistrate was in camp, a report was brought to him of the murder of one A, and a petition was presented to him that one B had compassed his death, it was added that B was present and might be arrested and sent to the police. The Magistrate passed no order for the arrest of B, but sent the petition filed against him to the Police Superintendent for disposal. B was arrested by the police on the strength of this order, and he was made over to the accused Ashraf Ali, police Sub-Inspector with the petition filed against him. Ashraf

Ali concluded the inquiry, and apparently released B, who was afterwards arrested by the police of another district. Ashraf Ali was then prosecuted under this section for having negligently suffered B's escape, and his conviction was upheld by Straight, J., who held B's detention as impliedly ordered by the Magistrate under section 167 of the Procedure Code, and whose release by the accused was therefore punishable under this section.<sup>1</sup> But the soundness of this decision is not quite apparent. In the first place, if the order of the Magistrate has been correctly set out in the report, it could not be construed to be an order for arrest, and it could certainly be not construed to be an indefinite remand to police custody under section 167 of the Procedure Code. To hold it otherwise would be carrying the doctrine of legal presumption too far.

2452. Measure of Negligence.—Lastly, what constitutes negligently suffering an escape? It would seem that the escape must be somehow or other directly due to the negligence, so that it might be possible to say that were it not for the negligence there would have been no escape.<sup>2</sup> The question whether an escape was or was not due to negligence, depends upon the absence of vigilance required to keep the prisoner in confinement. Such vigilance, as the rules prescribe, may be sufficient in the case of imprisoned convicts, but in the case of those otherwise confined, the measure of vigilance must be the necessity of each case. For instance, a person confined in the open would require greater vigilance than one confined in a room, and the vigilance required at night is not the same as will suffice during the day. But, at all times, it is the duty of all those responsible for the safe custody of prisoners, to regulate their vigilance according to the requirements of each case.

2453. The accused, a duffadar, in charge of one of the postern gates of a jail, suffered certain convicts to pass out of the gate at which he was stationed, not intending that they should escape, but to allow of their having an interview with their friends. The convicts taking advantage of accused's over-confidence, effected their escape. It was held, that though the accused could not be convicted under section 225 of the Code, still his offence fell within the terms of this section.<sup>3</sup> But the mere fact, that contrary to orders, the accused had marched the prisoner at night, and in consequence of which the latter was rescued, is not negligence for which the accused could be convicted under this section.<sup>4</sup> Here there was no doubt negligence, but it was not so great as to be criminally punishable. The case was held different where the jail warder in charge of the prisoner told off to do agricultural work, had been diverted to water trees in a distant cemetery from where, for lack of supervision, they effected their escape.<sup>5</sup>

2454. Indeed, this section is not intended to punish all escapes following upon negligence, but only such negligence as would reasonably create an apprehension in the mind of an ordinarily cautious person that the prisoner might escape. In the case last cited, the accused was undoubtedly guilty of violating both a departmental rule as well as the rule of ordinary caution; but, he could not have anticipated the surprise that awaited him. Such indeed was the predicament which befell the police escort of a dangerous prisoner whom they were carrying doubly handcuffed and tied to a rope round his waist. The prisoner being allowed to alight to answer the call of nature, gave a false alarm crying "Snake" and broke away from the constables. They were acquitted.<sup>6</sup>

[Offence—s. 40.

Illegal—s. 43.]

2455. Analogous Law.—This section punishes a person for escaping from custody or illegally opposing his arrest. The gist of the crime is again “intention” and the legality of his arrest or detention.

2456. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, but warrant must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. The offence of having escaped from custody may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the person charged may be found.<sup>1</sup> In passing a sentence under this section, the provision of section 396, cl. 2 of the Procedure Code should not be overlooked.<sup>2</sup>

2457. Proof.—This section deals with two offences: (a) resistance to apprehension and (b) escape from custody. The points requiring proof in each case are these :—

I. In case of resistance or illegal obstruction to one's apprehension :—

- (1) That the accused is charged with an offence.
- (2) That the accused offered resistance or obstruction.
- (3) That the resistance or obstruction offered was to one's apprehension.
- (4) That the resistance or obstruction offered was illegal.
- (5) That the accused offered it intentionally.

II. In case of escape or attempted escape from custody :—

- (1) That the accused had been charged with, or convicted of an offence.
- (2) That he was detained in custody.
- (3) That such detention was lawful.
- (4) That it was for the offence which he had been charged with or convicted of.
- (5) That he escaped from such custody, or attempted to escape from such custody.
- (6) That he did so intentionally.

2458. It will be observed that the two offences under this section may be committed by the same person, either in the course of the same transaction, or independently of each other. For instance, a convict may escape from custody, and may, on being apprehended, offer resistance. It will then be a question whether the offences committed by the accused are two independent offences, or only a single offence.

2459. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the—day of—you while—charged with the offence of—under section—of the Indian Penal Code, intentionally offered resistance or illegal obstruction to your lawful apprehension by—(mention the apprehending officer), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 224 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

“And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

In case of custody the charge should run thus :—

“That on or about the—day of—you while lawfully detained in custody (of—or by—or at—) for the offence of—under s.—of the Indian Penal Code, (or any other law) of which you were charged (or convicted) intentionally escaped (or attempted to escape from the said custody) (and that you further offered resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of yourself for the said offence of which you had been convicted) and that you thereby, etc.”

2460. Principle.—Sections 221-223 have been dealing with the offence of those who fail to apprehend, or confine those liable to be apprehended, or confined. The section punishes such persons themselves, the policy of the law being to regard all intentional disobedience to its behests in such matter, as criminal. The only thing postulated is the unlawfulness of the resistance or escape. This raises, again, the important question as to when is one's apprehension illegal and when not; and what resistance is justifiable in the case of an unlawful apprehension. The subject has been already discussed elsewhere, to which reference must be made for more particular information.<sup>1</sup>

2461. Escape or Resistance to Apprehension.—As has been sufficiently made clear elsewhere, this section deals with two distinct offences, committed independently of each other and under circumstances not always uniform. The first branch of the section deals with what it calls “resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself for any offence with which he is charged, or of which he has been convicted.” This implies that the person to be apprehended is at large, whether because he has escaped from custody after his conviction, or because he has never been arrested since he was charged with the offence. In short, such resistance may be either to one's capture or recapture, and in either case the questions arising are the same: (i) Was he charged with an offence? (ii) Was his apprehension legal? (iii) Was obstruction illegal? and (iv) Did he obstruct intentionally?

2464. Again, the person must have been “charged” with or convicted of the offence. The word “charged” here has been used in the popular sense as implying an imputation of the alleged offence<sup>6</sup> as distinguished from the judicial charge formulated after the recording of evidence in Court. A policeman arresting another on a suspicion of an offence accuses or charges him with an offence so that his resistance to his apprehension or his escape from custody would constitute an offence punishable under this section.<sup>7</sup> The “charging” must, of course, be by a person duly empowered, and under circumstances justifying it. If the charge was illegal, so would be the apprehension, and an illegal apprehension may in certain cases let in the right of private defence.<sup>8</sup> The fact that the charge is legal, does not necessarily imply that the apprehension was legal; for, it suppose the offence charged is bailable or non-cognizable, a police-officer has no right except in exceptional cases, to arrest the suspected offender.<sup>9</sup> In such a case, again, the apprehension being illegal, the accused would have the right to resist it.

2465. But if the apprehension was legal, then the person to be apprehended must offer no opposition, but must peacefully deliver up his body to the arresting officer. The latter, however, must not use more than the force necessary to effect arrest. Resistance or obstruction implies some active display of force, as distinguished from mere evasion of arrest.<sup>1</sup> And it has been held that trivial resistance to unlawful force on the part of an arresting officer, does not constitute an offence under this section.<sup>2</sup> (§ 2466.) Indeed, in such cases when blood is hot, law is feign to condone trivial application of force, on the principle of nimine non curat lex.<sup>3</sup>

2466. Apprehension Lawful and Unlawful.—The constitution of offences punishable in this and the next three following sections, depends upon the legality of the arrest; and it is therefore necessary to see when an arrest is lawful and when it is not; for, the legality of resistance or obstruction varies conversely with the lawfulness of apprehension or otherwise. The summary of the law here attempted is necessarily inexhaustive, but it illustrates the view the Courts are inclined to take, as regards the controlling qualification of these offences. In this connexion it will be observed that the provisions of these sections may appear somewhat in conflict with those of s. 99 which protects a public servant to the extent therein stated, even as regards an apprehension which though illegal, is yet made “in good faith under colour of his office, though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law.” But there is really no conflict between the two, whatever uncertainty might otherwise pervade the rule there enunciated (§§ 871, 877). These sections constitute special offences and are therefore to be treated as independent of s. 99, the effect of which is that a resistance or obstruction not justifiable under that section is not necessarily punishable under this and any of the next three following sections, unless it conforms to its terms though it might be punishable otherwise if it constitutes any other offence.

2467. For instance, such a resistance may amount to an assault, in which case, it might be punishable under s. 353, or s. 342<sup>4</sup> though it could not be punished under this or any of the three following sections. But it is only logically possible though it would be practically impossible, since the language of s. 353 is equally rigid on the subject. Moreover, it would be urged that when law does not punish a resistance except as provided in these sections, it does not intend to punish otherwise at all, for, on the subject of resistance these sections must be regarded as exhaustive.

2468. The power of the arresting officer not acting upon his own initiative, must then depend upon the authority under which he purports to act. In this respect, his immunity from a prosecution for making a wrongful arrest, is not co-extensive with the powers of the other to offer resistance. For, while the former possesses exceptional immunities in this respect (§§ 868-899), still it does not thence follow that the arrest so made is legal, or such as will make all resistance or obstruction to it illegal. A police-officer executing a warrant of arrest, is bound to notify the substance thereof to the person to be arrested, and if so required, to show him the warrant.<sup>5</sup> But this is not the procedure obligatory in all cases, and a person to be arrested under section 56 of the Procedure Code, cannot insist that the arresting officer shall inform him of the authority under which he is acting, nor does an omission to supply that information make the arrest illegal.<sup>6</sup> Of course, it may be desirable, and even obligatory, that if called upon, the police-officer making such an arrest, should show the person arrested, the authority under which he is acting; but to hold that he is bound to do so before he can properly arrest and detain in custody such a person, so as to make the arrest and the detention lawful, would be to extend the law beyond what the legislature has thought proper to declare it.<sup>1</sup> (§§ 2498-2505).

2469. Lawful Custody.—The second branch of the section deals with the offence of escaping or attempting to escape from lawful custody for any such offence, that is to say, for the offence with which the prisoner is charged, or of which he has been convicted. The prisoner may, of course, be wrongly charged for an offence, but that does not make his custody illegal.<sup>2</sup> All that the law requires is that, in order to render a person liable for escape, his detention must have been lawful. For, if it was unlawful, he commits no crime in preventing the doing of an unlawful act. In considering whether his custody was or was not lawful, regard must be had to the nature of the custody itself, as well as to the circumstances under which the authority to arrest and keep in custody arises.<sup>3</sup> A person cannot be said to be in lawful custody unless both his apprehension and detention are lawful. So where the prisoner had stolen a cow and a calf and hearing of a report made to the police the village watchman arrested him and with the assistance of the village servant kept him in custody from which he escaped and for which he was prosecuted, the Court held that as the watchman could not have legally arrested the accused except when the offence was committed in his presence,<sup>4</sup> his arrest was illegal, and the accused could not then be convicted for escaping from lawful custody.<sup>5</sup> So where a person was arrested lawfully by a private person under s. 59 of the Criminal Procedure Code and was made over to a chaukidar to be taken to the Police Station, the custody of the chaukidar is not lawful custody, and escape from him is not an offence under this section.<sup>6</sup>

2470. Under s. 10 of the Regulation XI of 1816 Pariah villagers in Madras are liable to be imprisoned in stocks for using abusive language. The accused being so imprisoned had escaped from custody, whereupon he was convicted under this section, but the High Court quashed his conviction on the ground that there was no evidence to show that the custody of the village servants was lawful—that is, being a substantial tenant he was not at all liable to be put into the stocks.<sup>7</sup> So the Madras Salt Act, 1889, only authorises searches for contraband salt, and arrests of the parties concerned in the keeping of such salt, to be made by officers of the Salt Department without search-warrant in cases where the delay in obtaining such search-warrant will prevent the discovery of such contraband salt. It was held that where the circumstances did not justify the officer in believing that the delay in obtaining a search-warrant would prevent the discovery of contraband salt, he had no power to search or arrest without such warrant, and the escape of the persons so arrested from custody was no offence under this section.<sup>8</sup> So where a person was arrested under what purported to be an extradition warrant, and he escaped from custody, and it was then discovered that the Commissioner who had countersigned it had not the powers of a Political Agent of the State requiring the prisoner, it was held that the latter could not be punished for escaping from what was not a lawful custody.<sup>9</sup> There is no escape from lawful custody of a judgment-debtor arrested in execution of a civil process, if he is released by the process server at the instance of the decree-holder.<sup>10</sup>

2471. The question whether a custody was or was not lawful, depends upon the authority and the manner of its execution. For this purpose, there are certain irregularities which law regards as venial, and others which vitiate the exercise of the power altogether. For instance, it is provided by law that a warrant directed to any police-officer may also be executed by any other police-officer whose name is indorsed upon the warrant by the officer to whom it is directed or indorsed.<sup>1</sup> Such indorsement must be naturally signed by the officer, but if instead of being signed it is only initialled, that alone does not vitiate the warrant.<sup>2</sup>

2472. But the case would be different if the warrant was not signed at all,<sup>3</sup> or if the arresting officer had no power of arrest,<sup>4</sup> or having had the power, no proper attempt was made to arrest a person.<sup>5</sup> A private person may arrest a person who in his view commits a non-bailable and cognizable offence, or has been proclaimed an offender.<sup>6</sup> The legality of such an arrest must then depend upon the strict compliance with the rule. If, therefore, the accused was arrested by the village watchman because he was wanted by the police for theft, his arrest being unjustifiable, the person arrested could escape from such custody without being liable to a conviction under this section.<sup>7</sup> But the case would have been different, if the person arrested had committed the theft in view of the watchman.<sup>8</sup> And a person arrested as he was running away after committing a theft, would for this purpose be deemed to have been arrested while committing the offence within the meaning of s. 59 of the Procedure Code.<sup>9</sup> And the fact that the arrest was justifiable does not necessarily make the escape unlawful. Suppose the warrant directed the arrest of a person bearing a certain name, say Ganga Charan Singh, and the police arrested altogether another person bearing the same name, the arrest may be a bona fide mistake, and therefore justifiable, but it does not make the apprehension lawful, nor the accused's escape unlawful.<sup>10</sup>

2473. Again, the mere fact that the apprehension was lawful, does not render escape from the custody unlawful. For the section is confined only to punishing the lawful apprehension or detention for any offence. Where, therefore, the accused had been arrested, and was being taken before a Magistrate for being bound over to be of good behaviour, when he escaped, he was held not to be guilty either under this section or under section 225-A of the Code.<sup>11</sup> But a committal for contempt of Court is a committal for an offence, and the escape of the accused ordered into custody by the presiding Magistrate would then be punishable under this section.<sup>12</sup> So while section 226 punishes an offender, of the offence of escaping from transportation, that section has been held only to apply when the convict escapes after he has been actually sent to a penal settlement, and returns before his term of transportation has expired or been remitted.<sup>13</sup> Where, therefore, the offender escapes while under the sentence of transportation, the appropriate section to convict him under is this section, and not section 226.<sup>14</sup>

told him that he had a warrant for him and took him before the Village Magistrate, who read out the warrant to the accused, and the process-server then informed him that he should pay up the amount. The accused offered to compromise the warrant by paying a less sum in satisfaction of the claim, but this was refused, and he then ran away. He was prosecuted under this section, and it was held that he was under arrest and in the custody of the process-server when he made his escape.<sup>1</sup>

2475. The Allahabad High Court has condemned the procedure of treating an escape of prisoners as merely an offence against the jail discipline. Such an escape is an offence under this section, and should be made over for trial to the regular tribunal established for the purpose. It could not be summarily disposed of by the Inspector-General of Prisons, though he may be a first class Magistrate.<sup>2</sup>

225. Whoever intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of any other person for an offence, or rescues or attempts to rescue any other person from any custody in which that person is lawfully detained for an offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

or, if the person to be apprehended, or the person rescued or attempted to be rescued, is charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence punishable with transportation for life or imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

or, if the person to be apprehended, or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence punishable with death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to a fine;

or, if the person to be apprehended or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is liable, under the sentence of a Court of Justice, or by virtue of a commutation of such a sentence, to transportation for life, or to transportation, penal servitude, or imprisonment, for a term of ten years or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; or, if the person to be apprehended or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is under sentence of death, shall be punished with transportation for life or imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

2476. Analogous Law.—This section, dealing with the offence of rescue, does not stand alone in the Code. For there are two other sections relating to the same offence. The rescue of prisoner of State or war is punishable under s. 130, and in any other case rescue is punishable as an obstruction under section 186.

First Clause By the President Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Second Clause—By the Court of Session, a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

In any other case—Exclusive by the Court of Session.

(1) Venkatachela, (1892) 1 Weir 206.

(2) Hasan Ali, (1894) 1 N. W. P. 76.

2478. It has been held in Madras that the word “or” as used in the second paragraph should not be read distinctively as denoting transportation for life, or imprisonment for ten years in the alternative. A second class Magistrate has, therefore, no jurisdiction to try an offender under section 225, if the person to be apprehended or attempted to be rescued is liable to be apprehended for, or is charged with an offence punishable with transportation for life, or an offence punishable with imprisonment for ten years.<sup>1</sup>

2479. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That some person other than the accused was detained in custody.
- (2) That his detention was lawful.
- (3) That the accused rescued or attempted to rescue him.
- (4) That the accused did so intentionally.

To which the aggravating circumstances are furnished by the second to fourth clauses in accordance with the gravity of the offence of the person rescued.

2480. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the——day of——you——intentionally offered resistance (or illegal obstruction) to the lawful apprehension of A B for the offence of——under section——of the Indian Penal Code (or rescued or attempted to rescue the said A B from the custody to which the said A B was lawfully detained from the offence of——), and that you thereby committed an offence under section 225 clause——of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2481. Principle.—Offenders offering resistance or illegal obstruction to their own apprehension are punishable under the last section. Others who do the same to rescue them are punishable under this section. They are looked upon as being, in a manner, abettors of the other's escape.

2482. Rescuing an Offender.—What is offering a resistance or illegal

(1) Meaning of “Rescue.” obstruction to the lawful apprehension of another person has been the subject of discussion under the preceding section. This section deals only with the resistance or obstruction as used to prevent the apprehension of another person. The section then goes on to speak of whoever rescues or attempts to rescue any other person. The word “rescue” has not been defined in the Code, but it is evidently used in the sense it has been used in English Law,<sup>2</sup> as implying the act of forcibly freeing a person from custody against the will of those who have him in custody.<sup>3</sup> Assisting another to escape from lawful custody is, in short, rescuing him. Rescue implies intention and the use of violence to effect the object desired.<sup>4</sup> Merely suffering another to escape from custody is not rescuing him from custody. For example, where the accused, a jail daffadar in charge of one of the postern gates of the jail, suffered certain convicts to pass out of the gate at which he was stationed, not intending that they should escape, but to allow of their having an interview with their friends, and the convicts taking advantage of the accused's over-confidence effected their escape, it was held that he could only be convicted under s. 223 and not under this section.<sup>5</sup> Now as the use of force is a necessary ingredient of causing the rescue, it follows that a person could not be convicted both of rescuing a prisoner and of using force for the purpose.<sup>6</sup> A person could not be punished for rescuing another from custody unless he was then aware that the person rescued was in custody. If he was in the custody of a private person, the accused may have nothing to show that the other was in custody, and he could not then be convicted of this offence, unless it is proved that he had notice that the person rescued was in custody.

(1) Venkata Subbier, (1890) 1 Weir 210.

(2) So 25 Geo. II, c. 37, s. 9, declared that if any person shall by force set at liberty or rescue any person out of prison guilty of certain offences shall be guilty of felony.

(4) Ghulam Ali, (1883) P. R. No. 19.

(5) Ib.

(6) Kalisankar, 12 W. R. 2.

2483. Of course, the section is not restricted to official custody, but extended to any custody, provided only it is lawful,<sup>1</sup> of which the accused must then be cognizant, for otherwise, his rescue cannot be deemed to be "intentional." For, if suppose A sees B committing a theft, and upon which he arrests him. B shouts for help, and C a passer-by comes to his rescue. B and A are seen struggling, in which A charges B with theft, B denies it. C rescues B, believing him to be innocent, could he be convicted of this offence, if it afterwards appear that A had arrested B flagrante delicto, and that his custody was therefore lawful. In such a case, C's intervention would have been well justified if A had arrested B when he did not see him committing the theft in his presence.<sup>2</sup> And it would be excused, as not intentional because he was misled by B. There was no intention to justify a conviction under this section, where the accused attacked the police for another reason and the accused took advantage of it and escaped.<sup>3</sup>

2484. Lawful Arrest or Custody.—Again, in order to be punishable the rescue must be from lawful apprehension or custody (§§ 2498-2504). For instance, if a constable is charged with the duty of apprehending a person on a warrant which is bailable, it is his duty to state that a bail would be taken. If, therefore, he did not intimate that fact and proceeded to arrest him, the arrest would be illegal, and the arrested person would be justified by the law of private defence in rescuing him, even by committing a common assault upon the constable, if necessary.<sup>4</sup> The Criminal Procedure Code confers no power on a police officer to depute persons who are not police officers to make an arrest which he himself could lawfully make.<sup>5</sup> Hence where the police-officer deputes villagers,<sup>6</sup> or a village chaukidar<sup>7</sup> to arrest a person and resistance is offered, it is equally justifiable. So again section 75 of the Code of Criminal Procedure makes it obligatory that a warrant of arrest shall bear the seal of the Court. Consequently, one sent out for execution without such seal is not a legal warrant and resistance to his execution would not be resistance to a lawful arrest.<sup>8</sup>

2485. The legality of an arrest or custody must thus be judged with reference to the law invoked for the purpose. If the arrest is illegal, the resistance is justifiable. Law, however, condones certain irregularities which do not render an arrest illegal. For example, a civil warrant for arrest addressed not by name, but merely to "the Bailiff of the Court" is not necessarily illegal so as to justify a resistance offered to its execution under this section.<sup>9</sup> Where, however, the accused were arrested under an unsigned warrant purporting to be issued by the Police Superintendent it was held the arrest was illegal and he was guilty of no offence for escaping from custody, though the persons who forcibly rescued him were punishable under s. 323.<sup>10</sup> A person who escapes from the jail in which he was confined for his failure to furnish security to be of good behaviour would be punishable under this and not the last section.<sup>11</sup>

225-A. Whoever, being a public servant legally bound as such public servant to apprehend, or to keep in confinement, any person in any case not provided for in s. 221, section 222 or section 223, or in any other law for the time being in force, omits to apprehend that person or suffers him to escape from confinement, shall be punished—

2486. Analogous Law.—This section was first inserted by the Amending Act of 1870,<sup>1</sup> and it then ran as follows :—

“ 225-A. Whoever escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained for failing under the Code of Criminal Procedure, to furnish security for good behaviour, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.”

Escape from custody for failing to furnish security. This section was added to supplement s. 224 which, as remarked before, only extended to escape from custody for an offence. As such, it only dealt with a special case of escape, which is now met by the more general provisions of the next section. Following the same policy, this section was substituted in 1886<sup>2</sup> for the one generally inserted, and it provides for intentional or negligent omission to apprehend not punishable under sections 221, 222, or 223, or any other law. The section is thus confessedly supplementary, and before it is applied, it will be necessary to see that there is no other provision in the Code or elsewhere applicable to the case. Such a case may be rare, but nevertheless it is conceivable. The chapters of the Code relating to General Exceptions (Ch. IV), Abetment (Ch. V) and Attempts (Ch. XXIII) apply to offences falling under this Chapter.<sup>3</sup>

2487. Procedure and Practice.—The prosecution of Judges and other public servants not removable from their office save by or with the sanction of a local Government is subject to its sanction.<sup>4</sup> The procedure applicable to this offence differs according as the omission or sufferance is intentional or merely negligent. But in either case it is non-cognizable, bailable and non-compoundable ; but if the omission or sufferance was intentional warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance, otherwise a summons should so issue. Again, in the former case, the offence is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class, in the latter case, it may be tried by a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

- (1) That the accused was a public servant.
- (2) That he was legally bound to apprehend or keep in confinement the person in question.<sup>5</sup>
- (3) That he omitted to apprehend that person, or suffered him to escape from confinement. That he did so either (a) intentionally or (b) negligently.
- (4) That the offence does not fall under ss. 221, 222, 223, or any other law.

2489. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the——day of——, you being a public servant legally bound as such public servant to apprehend (or to keep in confinement) one A B intentionally (or negligently) omitted to apprehend the said A B (or intentionally or negligently suffered the said A B to escape from confinement), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 225-A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

225-B. Whoever, in any case not provided for in s. 224 or s. 225 or in any other law for the time being in force, intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself or of any other person, or escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained or rescues or attempts to rescue any other person from any custody in which that person is lawfully detained, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

2490. Analogous Law.—This section absorbs the old section 225-A as it stood between 1870 and 1886, in which year this section was added and the last section substituted as it now stands.<sup>1</sup> The chapters of the Code relating to General Exceptions (Ch. IV), Abetment (Ch. V), and Attempts (Ch. XXIII) apply to offences falling under this section.<sup>2</sup>

2491. The section was added to supply a glaring omission in law, noticed in consequence of two reported cases,<sup>3</sup> in which it had been held that a person escaping from custody when being taken before a Magistrate and for the purpose of being bound over to be of good behaviour not being punishable either under section 224 or section 225 of the Code, was not punishable at all. That such a person is as guilty as one charged for a specific offence was manifest, and the insertion of this section now enables the Court to punish such absconders.<sup>4</sup> It also provides for the punishment of those who escape from arrest before they are delivered into custody, for which there was no appropriate provision before.<sup>5</sup>

2492. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but non-compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. Ordinarily, a complaint under this section must be made by the public servant aggrieved by the resistance or obstruction, though there is nothing to prevent a volunteer from doing so.<sup>6</sup>

I. In case of apprehension—

- (1) That either the accused or some other person was apprehended.<sup>7</sup>
- (2) That such apprehension was lawful.<sup>8</sup>
- (3) That the accused offered some resistance or illegal obstruction.
- (4) That such resistance or illegal obstruction was intentional.<sup>9</sup>
- (5) That he did so to prevent the lawful apprehension of himself or of some other person.
- (6) That the case is one not provided for by s. 224 or s. 225.

II. In case of escape from custody or rescue—

- (1) That the accused (a) escaped, or (b) attempted to escape from custody ; or (c) rescued, or (d) attempted to rescue any other person from any custody,
- (2) That the custody was in any case lawful.

2496. Resistance Not Otherwise Provided for.—This section provides a punishment for resistance or illegal obstruction to arrest or for escape or rescue from custody, in cases not already met by the provisions of section 224 or 225. In this respect this section is merely supplementary to those sections, from which it borrows its phraseology, and in the light of which it must be construed. The only distinguishing feature this section offers is in the maximum punishment, which is only six months as against the two years or more awardable under s. 224 or 225. As this section then deals with a comparatively lighter offence, its provisions should only be resorted to when those of sections 224 and 225 are inapplicable. Such would be the case where the apprehension or detention is not for an offence, but for any other purpose. Obviously, the section was intended to overrule the two cases<sup>4</sup> in which the Code was held to contain no provision for punishing a person proceeded against for good behaviour, added to which there may be cases of arrest under civil process, resistance to which would also be punishable under this section.<sup>5</sup> But whatever may have been the occasion for the arrest, two things are essential to make the section applicable—(a) that the arrest must not be for an offence, and (b) that it must be lawful. Thus a resistance to apprehension on a warrant issued by a Collector for non-payment of land revenue or other miscellaneous public dues, as for example, ferry dues, would be punishable under this section.<sup>6</sup> So in cases of contempt a person may be arrested, and punished under this section.

2497. It has already been noted (§ 2495) that the phraseology employed in ss. 224, 225 and this section is resistance or illegal obstruction—words which imply active opposition by show of force and not merely a verbal challenge or a passive resistance, as where a person runs away or into his house to avoid his arrest which is not punishable under this section,<sup>7</sup> which contemplates an overt act of resistance or obstruction by use or show of force in defiance of the exercise of lawful authority of a public servant. Consequently, where a person is merely defiant and challenges with words “Arrest me if you can: I won’t go” or that “if he is taken, a fight would ensue” or other words to that effect there is no obstruction or resistance such as the law here reprobates and punishes. For other cases, see s. 183 comm.

2498. The only question in such cases then remaining is: was the arrest legal, which, of course, means not only that the arrest was duly authorized by the lawful authority of a public servant, but also that it was carried out in a lawful manner. If the arrest is under a process issued under the Code of Criminal Procedure, then it must be effected in accordance with its provisions.<sup>8</sup> Even if the arrest be under Civil Process the same procedure must be observed.<sup>9</sup> Where, therefore, the bailiff of a Civil Court met the accused in the street, showed his staff, told him he was under arrest but did not touch him, and the accused instead of going with him, walked away and entered a shop, it was held that he had never been arrested at all and therefore, he could not be convicted for escaping from lawful custody.<sup>1</sup> Again, the arrest of a judgment-debtor in execution of a decree must be made within the jurisdiction of the Court. If, therefore, a person being without jurisdiction is illegally brought within it and then arrested, the arrest is illegal,<sup>2</sup> and the escape of such a person would then be not punishable under this section.

2499. Again, the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes certain restrictions limiting the right and mode of arrest.<sup>3</sup> The legality of the arrest would then depend upon their observance. It is the duty of the officer arresting in execution of a decree to be in possession of the warrant, for the judgment-debtor is entitled to see it, and to avert his arrest by paying up the decretal amount. If, therefore, he is arrested by one without a warrant in his possession, he cannot be punished for escaping from such custody.<sup>4</sup> There is, however, no provision in the Code entitling the judgment-debtor to inspect the warrant. His arrest cannot, therefore, be held to be illegal merely because the bailiff refused to shew him the warrant. But if he is not bound to shew the warrant, it is the duty of all officers effecting an arrest whether they be bailiffs or police-men to disclose the contents of their warrants, and an arrest otherwise made cannot be deemed lawful.<sup>5</sup> A warrant without the seal of the court issuing it, or without proper endorsement<sup>6</sup> or incomplete without the name to whom it is given for execution<sup>7</sup> or made out in a wrong name or for the arrest of a person whose father's name is wrongly given would be one in which the arrest made would be illegal.<sup>8</sup> The case is, of course, worse where the warrant omits to mention the name of the person to be arrested.<sup>9</sup>

2500. Section 90 of the Code of Criminal Procedure empowers the Code to substitute a warrant instead of a summons "after recording its reasons in writing"—which implies that such reasons must be particular to each and so considered. If, therefore, the Magistrate adopts a stereotyped printed form as in compliance with this section it would be an abuse of power against the execution of which resistance would be justifiable.<sup>10</sup> Where however, an officer has a discretion in the matter, and he uses it after exercise of some judgment, his erroneous exercise of it does not render his act illegal. For instance, a process for recovery of the arrears of revenue, should according to the rules of the United Provinces Board of Revenue, ordinarily issue against the Lambardar in the first instance; but if the Collector finds it expedient to issue process in the first instance against the defaulter himself, ordering his arrest and detention, the arrest is legal, and escape from custody is an offence punishable under this section.<sup>11</sup>

2501. So where the Collector ordered the arrest of one Debi Singh, son of Gunraj Singh, and the police arrested one Debi Singh, son of Rang Lal Singh, the Court held that it lay on the prosecution to prove that the person arrested was the same person whose arrest had been ordered, in the absence of which the accused could not be dealt with for escape.<sup>12</sup> Of course, in such a case it was open to the prosecution to prove that in spite of the father's wrong name the accused had been rightly arrested. The fact that there is an error on the face of the warrant is not then conclusive, unless it had led to the arrest of a wrong man, or led the person arrested astray. If, for instance, there had been two Debi Singhs in the same village with their father's name as Gunraj and Rang Lal, Debi, son of Gunraj, might well have complained that, though a defaulter, it was the other Debi and not he whose arrest had been ordered.

2503. Again, the warrant of arrest must be executed by a person duly authorized to do so. The warrant of arrest of a Civil Court Arrestor must Possess Authority. must be addressed to the bailiff of the Court,<sup>2</sup> and an arrest made by a person not so authorized would be illegal, so that there could be no punishment for an escape.<sup>3</sup> If the person deputed to effect an arrest was incompetent to do so, the fact that there was authority for the arrest would not make the arrest legal. For instance, under the provisions of the Procedure Code an officer in charge of a police-station is only empowered to requisition an officer subordinate to him to effect an arrest. The legality of an arrest so effected would then depend upon the subordination of the arresting officer to the officer ordering it.<sup>4</sup> In Bengal, a chowkidar appointed under the provisions of the Village Chowkidar Act<sup>5</sup> was in one case said to be a subordinate of the officer in charge of the police-station, so that a requisition addressed to him under that section to arrest a person was held legal, and escape from such custody punishable under this section,<sup>6</sup> but other cases lay down the contrary, holding that the custody by a chowkidar is not a legal custody, and resistance to it is justifiable.<sup>7</sup>

2504. An insane criminal detained in jail escaping therefrom on recovering sanity would bring himself within the provisions of this section, though he could not be convicted under section 224.<sup>8</sup> The intentional resistance or obstruction here punishable implies active opposition accompanied by use or threatened use of force. Mere evasion is not such resistance. There, for instance, the accused, seeing a process-server accompanied by the decree-holder coming in his direction with a warrant for his arrest in execution of his decree, ran into his house and would not come out when called upon to do so, he could not be said to resist or obstruct the process-server within the meaning of this section.<sup>9</sup> A debtor is under no obligation to wait till he is arrested, or to offer himself for arrest when he is once out of the reach of the bailiff. He is perfectly entitled to make his escape if he can but if once he is arrested he is not then free to escape whenever he gets a chance.

2505. For, once a person is in lawful custody, he commits the offence of "escape" even though the escape may be effected by the consent or the neglect of the custodian, for neither such illegal consent nor neglect absolves the prisoner from the duty of submitting to the judgment of the law.<sup>10</sup> So the fact that the accused escaped because the peon who had him in custody had fallen asleep does not in any way put an end to the custody or affect the accused's duty to submit to the judgment of the law.<sup>11</sup> Nor is his escape any the less an escape from custody because he was independently of him rescued from the police custody,<sup>12</sup> or because he took advantage of an attack made upon the police by persons unconnected with his rescue.<sup>1</sup>

2506. Resistance to Unlawful Arrest.—It has been held by a single Judge that though the warrant for arrest was illegal still the use of criminal force to effect rescue of a person so arrested by a police constable would be punishable under s. 352.<sup>2</sup> The reason given in support of this view is (it is submitted) unsound. It is said that the accused did not know that the warrant was illegal and that therefore they were guilty of assault. But the right of private defence does not depend upon such knowledge. Though under s. 100 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it is open to a Magistrate to issue a general search warrant, still where he issues it for the search of a person confined in a house, a police constable, cannot take charge of the person not found in the house, but whom he met in the field. A rescue of such a person is not illegal so as to expose the accused to the penalty of this section.<sup>3</sup>

2507. No Offence.—Of course, a child under seven cannot be convicted of this offence.<sup>4</sup>

226. Whoever, having been lawfully transported, returns from such transportation, the term of such transportation not having expired, and his punishment not having been remitted, shall be punished with transportation for life, and shall also be liable to fine and to be imprisoned with rigorous imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years before he is so transported.

Unlawful return from transportation.

[Transportation—ss. 53, 263-266.]

2508. Analogous Law.—This was clause 203 in the Bill, but the sentence of imprisonment for three years here provided did not exist in the original where the only additional sentence awardable was that of fine. The provisions of this section are taken from the Georgian Statute relating to the transportation of convicts,<sup>5</sup> section 22 of which, dealing with the offence here enacted, provides as follows:—

“S. 22. If any offender who shall have been or shall be so sentenced or ordered to be transported or banished, or who shall have agreed or shall agree to transport or banish himself or herself on certain conditions, either for life or any number of years, under the provisions of this or any former Act, shall be afterwards at large within any part of His Majesty's dominions, without some lawful cause, before the expiration of the term for which such offender shall have been sentenced or ordered to be transferred or banished, or shall have so agreed to transport or banish himself or herself, every such offender so being at large being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer death, as in cases of felony, without the benefit of clergy; and such offender may be tried either in the County or place where he or she shall be apprehended, or in that from whence he or she was ordered to be transported or banished; and if any person shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, or assist in rescuing or attempting to rescue any such offender from the custody of such superintendent, or overseer, or of any sheriff or gaoler, or other person conveying, removing, transporting or reconveying him or her, or shall convey or cause to be conveyed, any disguise, instrument for effecting escape or arms to such offender, every such offence shall be punishable in the same manner as if such offender had been confined in a gaol or prison, in the custody of the sheriff or gaoler, for the crime of which such offender shall have been convicted; and whoever shall discover and prosecute to conviction any such offender so being at large within this kingdom, shall be entitled to a reward of twenty pounds for every such offender so convicted.”<sup>6</sup>

2509. This section provides only the punishment for unlawful return from transportation, the other matters referred to in the above Statute being dealt with elsewhere.

2510. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is neither bailable nor compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

2511. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused had been transported.
- (2) That his transportation was lawful.
- (3) That his transportation had not expired.
- (4) That his sentence had not been remitted,
- (5) That the accused had returned from such transportation.

2512. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That you——on or about the——day of——, at——were sentenced to transportation in case No.——of——by the Session Judge of——for the offence of——(specify the offence), and that on the——day of——at——you returned from such transportation, the term of which had not expired, and your punishment not having been remitted, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 226 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

2513. Meaning of Words.—“ Returns from.....transportation ”: Returns means that the prisoner had been actually transported. A prisoner who escaped from a jail where he was confined before he was transported cannot be convicted under this section.<sup>1</sup>

2514. Unlawful Return from Transportation.—This section only applies to persons lawfully transported, that is to say, to persons upon whom not only has the sentence of transportation been lawfully passed, but who in execution of that sentence have been actually sent to a penal settlement. It has obviously no application to a convict who escapes from custody whilst on his way to undergo the sentence of transportation. Such a person may be punished under s. 224, but he could not be punished under this section.<sup>2</sup> So a person serving out his sentence of transportation in the jail without being transported is not a person “lawfully transported” and his escape from confinement would then be only punishable under section 224, though, of course, it will then be open to the executive to direct his transportation in execution of his original sentence.<sup>3</sup> This section was construed by the Law Commissioners to refer only to a person transported for a term of years not by way of commutation, there being another section in the Bill prescribing the penalty for returning from the commuted sentence of transportation.<sup>4</sup> But as the section is now worded, it extends to all transportation whether it was the primary or the commuted sentence. It does not however, extend to deportation, which is not transportation, though a person deported may also be transported. Indeed, the section only deals with escapes from a judicial sentence, which deportation is not. The transportation may have been for life or only for a number of years, but unlawful return therefrom exposes the delinquent to the additional penalty of transportation for life as well as fine, and to a sentence of imprisonment which may extend to three years. In order to constitute an unlawful return, it is not necessary that the transported convict should have had a substantial sentence to undergo, for his offence is complete if he returns a day before his sentence is complete. But if he is enlarged or his sentence is remitted—it may be, illegally remitted—he incurs no penalty by his return.

2515. Nor does he incur any penalty if he returns from a transportation to which he was not “lawfully” sentenced. This word would seem to suggest that there must have been not only jurisdiction in the sentencing Court, but the offence must be one for which transportation is a legal sentence. But in a case the prisoner being indicted for unlawful return from transportation, a certificate of the clerk of the peace was filed to prove the conviction and sentence, from which it appeared that the prisoner had been transported at the Sessions for fourteen years for larceny. That sentence could not be legally passed for simple larceny, but Alderson B., after consulting several of the judges, held that the sentence was valid until it was reversed, and that was enough.<sup>1</sup>

227. Whoever, having accepted any conditional remission of punishment, knowingly violates any condition on which such remission was granted, shall be punished with the punishment to which he was originally sentenced, if he has already suffered no part of that punishment, and if he has suffered any part of that punishment, then with so much of that punishment as he has not already suffered.

Violation of condition of remission of punishment.

2516. Analogous Law.—This section deals with the conditional remission of punishment provided for in section 401 of the Procedure Code. Under that section, the Governor-General in Council or the Local Government has the power to suspend or remit any sentence conditionally or unconditionally. On breach of condition the Procedure Code empowers the same authority to arrest the accused and remand him to undergo the unexpired portion of the sentence.<sup>2</sup> This may be done as a matter of executive action, and apart from the section under which, however, the same end may be achieved after a judicial trial.

2517. Procedure and Practice.—As the police cannot be made judges of the violation of condition by the accused, the offence is necessarily non-cognizable and summons may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable, and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court by which the original offence was triable, which means by any Court empowered by law to try any such offence as that for which the convict was under sentence. So where a person was convicted by the Recorder's Court of Prince of Wales' Island in Singapore and Malacca, of the crime of burglary, and sentenced to transportation for ten years, at a place to be appointed by the Governor-General of India in Council, he was consequently incarcerated in the Ratnagiri jail, from which after undergoing a sentence of more than eight years' imprisonment, he was released on a ticket-of-leave, and while on such leave, he committed theft in a dwelling house, it was held that the accused could be tried for his offence under this section by a full-power Magistrate at Karwar where he had violated the condition of his release.<sup>3</sup> In this case the objection to the accused's conviction appears to have been based on the ground that his previous conviction being by the Recorder at Singapore, no Court in British India had jurisdiction to try him, but the contention was, of course, overruled. The accused's conviction in that case was for the offence of burglary, an offence which answers to house-breaking by night under the Code. The Court empowered to try for the latter offence, was therefore held competent to try the accused for his offence under this section.

2518. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused had been sentenced to a punishment.
- (2) That that punishment had been remitted.
- (3) That the remission was conditional.
- (4) That the condition made was accepted by the accused.
- (5) That in consequence of his acceptance of the condition he was released.
- (6) That the accused violated that condition.
- (7) That he violated it after his release.
- (8) That he did so knowingly.

The first three conditions can only be proved by documentary evidence.

So also the fourth and the fifth, if they were reduced to writing.<sup>4</sup>

2519. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—
 "That you—on or about the—day of—were sentenced in case No.—of—by the Court of—to—(specify the punishment) and which punishment was remitted on—by the order of—on your accepting the following condition, to wit—(set out the condition) and which you accepted, and which you knowingly violated in that on or about the——day of——you——(specify the nature of the violation) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 227 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge. ”

2520. Breach of Conditional Remission.—The Procedure Code empowers the Governor-General in Council and the Local Government to release a convicted person or suspend his sentence on, or without condition. Where the suspension or remission is unconditional, no case can, of course, arise, under this section. Nor does this section apply to a conditional suspension of a sentence. It applies only to a conditional remission of a sentence, in which case too the authority remitting the sentence has reserved the power of recalling its remission on breach of the condition upon which it had been made. In this case, the question of breach is a matter for the decision of the same authority.<sup>1</sup> But it is also one which the Court may have to consider in a case arising under this section. Such a case would ordinarily arise where offenders are, after undergoing a substantial part of their sentence, released on probation on a ticket-of-leave, in which case, their liberation is conditional upon their good behaviour. There may be other conditions imposed, as to the place of residence, or exclusion from a certain locality or the like, the breach of which would entail a prosecution under this section.

2521. The breach of condition must, of course, “ be made knowingly ” which implies that the accused was aware of the term of his release which he was violating. It will then be necessary for the prosecution to prove that (a) there was a specified condition made with, offered to and accepted by the accused as a term of the remission of his sentence, and (b) that he broke it. The fact that he broke it “ knowingly ” would then be one for inference. If the condition was equivocal or ambiguous, vague or uncertain, the accused may well claim exoneration on the ground that he did not understand it in the sense it was sought to be enforced. If suppose a person is convicted for rioting and the condition of his release is that he shall not live in a certain neighbourhood the object being to prevent recurrence of a riot with a certain community there resident and hostile to him. He avoids the locality, but provokes another riot with the same community, could he be said to have violated the condition of his release? It would seem not, because he was only prohibited from residing in a circumscribed area and he could not be held responsible for any thing beyond.

228. Whoever intentionally offers any insult, or causes any interruption to any public servant while such public servant is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Intentional insult or interruption to public servant sitting in judicial proceeding.

2522. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes a punishment for contempt of Court, an offence which may be tried either under the provisions of the contempt of Courts Act or under this section or may be otherwise summarily dealt with by a Court of Record under its inherent power<sup>2</sup> or under the Code of Criminal Procedure,<sup>3</sup> if it is committed in facie curiae. But the penalty in such case is limited to a maximum fine of Rs. 200, which the Court may not consider sufficient, in which case the offender may be committed for a regular trial under this section. Other allied offences are described in the Code under sections 175, 178, 179 and 180, and the procedure applicable in each case is the same.

2523. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be legally initiated under this section, without the previous complaint of the Court concerned.<sup>4</sup> It is pointed out that the Courts should not be unduly sensitive about their dignity,<sup>1</sup> and convict persons for contempt cases in which the insult offered to the Court was not intentional ; e.g., where the accused let fall a coarse expression and was afterwards contrite,<sup>2</sup> or where the offence is technical or of a slight and trivial nature and is not calculated to prejudice the fair trial.<sup>3</sup> Where the Court elects to take action it is necessary that it should record the stage of judicial proceeding interrupted and the evidence that it was intentional.<sup>4</sup> An omission in this respect is not curable under s. 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code.<sup>5</sup>

2525. Of course, where the procedure followed is that laid down in s. 480 of the Procedure Code, it is essential that the record should show the nature and stage of judicial proceeding in which the Court interrupted or insulted was sitting and the nature of the interruption or insult.<sup>7</sup> Where, therefore, in a case of a conviction under section 480 of the Procedure Code, all that appeared from the record was that the Court (a Tahsildar) was at a certain village for the purpose of attesting transfers in his capacity as revenue Court, and that the accused and another lambardar, on being told by the Tahsildar that they had rendered no assistance, gave him insolent replies, but it did not appear that at the time of the alleged insult the Tahsildar was engaged in any particular proceedings under section 40 of the Land Revenue Act, 1871, or the rules thereunder applicable to him, it was held that though the conduct of the accused was insolent, still they could not be summarily punished for contempt under section 480, as there was nothing to show that the Tahsildar was then sitting in some stage of a judicial proceeding which is the gravamen of the offence.<sup>8</sup>

2526. So in another case, all that appeared on record was the following : " Babu Surendra Nath Banerjea produced before me a prisoner arrested in course of an affray with the police, and was repeatedly ordered by me to keep silence, while I was passing orders in his case, after the case was decided. As he disobeyed, I order him under section 480, Criminal Procedure Code, to pay under section 228 of the Indian Penal Code, a fine of Rs. 200, or in default to go to jail for one week." To this judgment was added the following postscript : " Given an opportunity of apologizing but refuses." The words " as he disobeyed " were confessedly added three days later upon which the High Court on revision held that the interpolation of the words after the judgment had been pronounced without notice to the accused was, to say the least, highly irregular, and it refused to treat them as a part of the judgment. For the rest the Court condemned the record as not made according to law. " A full and clear record," the Court observed, "as contemplated by section 481 is not only a guarantee of the coolness and judicial temper of the presiding officer, but also affords materials for the Appellate Court to proceed on . . . the proceedings of the District Magistrate are too laconic, and contravene the directions of the law." They were, therefore, quashed.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) That the accused insulted or interrupted.
- (2) That the person so insulted or interrupted was a public servant.
- (3) That he did so intentionally.
- (4) And at a time while he was sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding.<sup>2</sup>

2528. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That you—on or about the—day of—intentionally offered insult (or caused interruption), to wit—(specify the insult, or interruption) to—a public servant, while he was sitting in a stage of a judicial proceeding, namely—(specify the proceeding) and thereby committed an offence under section 228 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on said charge."

2529. Principle.—The essence of the crime of the contempt of Court lies in the respect due to the administrator of justice and the necessity of protecting him against interruptions and insults. Such interruptions and insults must be intentional, and where it is a case between the Bench and Bar, the Court is loth to act unless there is clear proof that the conduct of the pleader was so clearly vexatious as to lead to the inference that his intention was no other but to insult and interrupt the Court.<sup>3</sup> The section is only confined to the protection of persons sitting at a stage of a judicial proceeding. Officers not so sitting are regarded as entitled to no special protection.

2530. Contempt of Court.—It is contempt of Court to intentionally offer insult or cause interruption to a public servant in any stage of a judicial proceeding. Three things are then essential to constitute this offence: (a) intention, (b) insult or interruption, and (c) the public servant insulted or interrupted being then sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding.

2531. In the first place then, the insult or interruption must be intentional.

(i) Insult or Interruption must be Intentional.

The fact that the Court feels insulted is no reason for holding that any insult was intended. No such insult is intended when an assessor appears in deshabille,<sup>4</sup> nor is any insult implied, if the accused, upon his trial, especially if he is undefended, continues speaking after he is told to desist. As was observed in a case: "Merely uttering of words and not keeping silent can hardly be construed as intentional insult or interruption caused by an undefended prisoner during the course of a judicial proceeding against him."<sup>5</sup> Indeed, it is a spectacle of every-day occurrence in the Courts, that men who have measured their words before, become suddenly loquacious when in the presence of Court, and if the Court perchance lets fall an expression hostile to their case, it suffices to add fresh fuel to the fire of their loquacity. In such cases it would be disastrous to the confidence reposed in the justice of Courts to hold that the person not desisting from talking intends to insult or interrupt the Court. So in the case of pleaders appearing for their clients, the Court should not put down every interruption as constituting contempt. As was observed in a case: "Some latitude should be allowed to a member of the Bar, insisting, in the conduct of his case, upon his question being taken down, or his objection noted. Where the Court thinks the question inadmissible or the objection untenable, there ought to be a spirit of give and take between the Bench and the Bar in such matters, and every little persistence on the part of a pleader should not be turned into an occasion for a criminal trial, unless the pleader's conduct is so clearly vexatious as to lead to the inference that his intention is to insult or interrupt the Court."<sup>1</sup>

2532. Every protest made, may, in fact, does interrupt the Court, but it is their duty to listen to protests howmuchsoever they may delay their proceedings. So long as they are made bona fide they do not constitute the interruption which the section punishes as a contempt. But if they are made with that sole object in view, they cease to be bona fide and they may then supply a necessary element to constitute the crime. But even here the accused is allowed considerable latitude. He is on trial, and his liberty is in jeopardy and he is therefore the fit object of judicial commiseration. His pleas should not be too narrowly scanned, and the fact that they are even scurrilous or scandalous should not weigh with the Court in treating them as contempts. Such was the view taken in a case in which the accused, being arraigned before a Deputy Magistrate for rioting, protested against his trial by him on the ground of enmity due to his intimacy with a woman and on whose account the Magistrate had had him implicated as a rioter. It was held that this section was never intended to apply to pleadings such as these and that in any case the object of the accused was to secure a transfer of his case, for which purpose he had made the statement which could not then be said to have been made intentionally to insult the Magistrate.<sup>2</sup> In such a case the accused may be guilty of defamation, but the Court cannot in that case order his prosecution under section 476 of the Procedure Code. His proper procedure then is to file a complaint not in his capacity as a judicial officer, but in his personal capacity.<sup>3</sup>

2533. In 1862, Sir Barnes Peacock and his eight associate Judges held that the High Court had jurisdiction to punish for contempt out of Court, but in a case before them, they accepted an apology from the accused and closed the incident.<sup>4</sup>

2534. This case, however, raises an important question so far as regards contempts out of Court. Captain Francis was held guilty of that offence, though all that he had done was to visit Morgan, J., on a specific mission and demanded an apology. In such cases there is authority to hold that a person cannot be charged for contempt of Court. As Anderson, J., said in a case: "There are diverse Statutes that for private discourtesies one shall not be imprisoned, and, therefore, I do not see how this custom can be maintained. A man may be imprisoned for a contempt done in Court, but not for a contempt done out of Court, and, therefore, he ought not to have been committed for such a private abuse."<sup>5</sup> This was the view of the whole Court, and the prisoner was discharged. So in another case Lord Abinger said: "Then if the judge had received that letter not sitting in Court it would not have amounted to a contempt"; and again: "I can only say that if I received such a letter, I should not consider myself at liberty to commit him"<sup>6</sup> to which Alderson, B., added: "There would be a great many committals if such a course were pursued by judges."

2535. This is now the view taken by the Privy Council whose judgment was also delivered by Sir Barnes Peacock, who therein held that this section does not provide against contempt of Court committed out of Court, or when the Court is not sitting,<sup>7</sup> though the power to commit for such contempts is possessed by the High Courts as Superior Courts of Record, independently of the Code. Such power was formerly a part of the Common law, and was conferred upon the Supreme Courts when they were established in the Presidency towns, and which was transferred to the High Courts when they were established in their place (§§ 83-84). It was evidently in this view that the learned judges had convicted Captain Francis.

2536. "Sitting in a Judicial Proceeding."—The offence of contempt of Court may then, so far as regards the High Courts, be committed independently of this section, and when the insult or interruption is not given or made in facie curiae. In all other cases, the offence can only be committed if the insult or interruption is offered or made in the presence of the Court, and not otherwise, or as the section puts it, when the public servant is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding. What is then judicial proceeding? The term has been evidently used here in the same sense as it has been used in section 192 to which reference should be made for more particular information.

2537. In this connection, it has been held that the proceedings of a Sub-Registrar of assurances are judicial proceedings within the meaning of this section, so that an insult or interruption caused to him would be punishable under this section.<sup>1</sup> For the purpose of this section, judicial proceedings are not concluded when sentence is passed, but continue until the prisoner is discharged or removed in custody.<sup>2</sup>

2538. But the fact that a person was at a given moment conducting a judicial proceeding does not constitute a contempt, if he in the midst of that work turned to the execution of his executive duties and was then insulted. A Tahsildar who was engaged in hearing a civil case allowed his proceedings to be interrupted by the accused, a lambardar, who had brought a part of a sum due from him for revenue, and who promised the balance on a later date. On the Tahsildar pressing for immediate payment in full, the accused abused him, and an order being given for his arrest, he resisted such arrest. It was held that the interruption suffered put an end to the judicial proceeding, after which the Tahsildar was not sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding, and that therefore the conviction of the accused under this section was unsustainable.<sup>3</sup>

2539. What Amounts to Insult or Interruption.—Contempts of Court consist in the intentional insult or interruption in the Court of a judicial proceeding. In dealing with the question of intention, something has been said about what is not an insult or interruption. (§ 2540). To which it may be added, that a person merely prevaricating while giving evidence,<sup>4</sup> though frequently warned against it,<sup>5</sup> or reluctantly speaking the truth, or retracting statements,<sup>6</sup> or giving inconsistent or incoherent replies,<sup>7</sup> cannot be condemned for contempt of Court, because he takes up the time of the Court. Nor does the mere fact, that a person refused to reply to a question put by the Court, and marching out of Court without answering the question whether he had any witness, amount to that offence.<sup>8</sup>

2540. So a person who leaves the Court when he is ordered to remain<sup>9</sup> or refuses to leave when he is so ordered,<sup>10</sup> and even listens to the evidence which he is ordered to keep away from, or makes signs from outside to a prisoner on his trial<sup>11</sup> cannot be punished for an offence under this section. So a person absenting himself from Court in disobedience to a summons<sup>12</sup> may be punished otherwise for the disobedience, but it is not contempt, within the meaning of this section.

If the prevarication was merely intended to evade replies to inconvenient questions it would not amount to contempt whatever the interruption caused to the Court; on the other hand, if it was carried to the length of amounting to refusal to answer question, it is punishable under s. 179.

A person using vulgar language in Court may or may not be guilty of contempt for it depends upon his intention. If he used it only for the purpose of emphasis it is no insult to the Court so as to amount to an offence under this section.<sup>1</sup> But where a witness persisted in chewing betel while being examined, his conviction for this offence was held to be right.<sup>2</sup> So persisting in putting irrelevant and vexatious questions to a witness after warning, might amount to a contempt.<sup>3</sup> So mock-bidding at a Court-auction, with the knowledge that he is not in a position to deposit the earnest-money would be contempt punishable as much under this section as under section 184 or section 186.

2541. It has been remarked before, that a persistent refusal to answer questions put to a witness does not amount to contempt.<sup>4</sup> The authority upon which this statement rests was explained by the same Court in two subsequent cases<sup>5</sup> to be insufficient to support a general statement that, to whatever extent carried, a prevarication does not amount to a contempt under this section. This does not appear to be the trend of the earlier cases; nor indeed, can it be laid down as an inflexible rule that prevarication can under no circumstance amount to contempt. The true rule appears to be, that prevarication cannot be construed to be a contempt, where the intention of the witness was to evade giving replies to inconvenient questions and not to interrupt the Court. In such a case prevarication may be carried to a criminal stage, but the offence then committed would be one under section 179 rather than under this section. If, however, the prevarication was directed against the Court, as if the intention was to insult or interrupt the Court, the offence would then, of course, be under this section.<sup>6</sup> Such was held to be the case where the accused threatened a witness while under examination<sup>7</sup> or refused to answer questions unless an application made by him for stay of the proceedings was granted,<sup>8</sup> or, worse still where the accused when asked to make a statement under s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code called the judge "a prejudiced judge"—an expression which he declined to withdraw after he had time for reflexion.<sup>9</sup> It is of course no contempt under this section for a person to marry a girl in disobedience of the order of the court.<sup>10</sup>

2542. Other Contempts Not in Facie Curiae.—In the preceding discussion contempts of two kinds have formed the subject of discussion those dealt with under the section, and those committed not in facie curiae, but which under the Common Law are still punishable as contempts. The latter do not find a place in the Code, but that they are contempts cannot be denied. For this purpose Law distinguishes between Courts of record and inferior Courts. The former possess unlimited jurisdiction in matters of contempt, which is independent of the Statute law<sup>11</sup> (§§ 83-84). In what cases that jurisdiction would be exercised may be briefly set out here. In England, a contumacious disobedience of the order of the Court amounts to contempt, and is punishable as such.<sup>12</sup> Where such disobedience is confined to non-attendance in obedience to a summons or order, the contempt is punishable under section 174. Where it consists of intentional resistance or obstruction to the taking of property it is punishable under ss. 183 and 184. In fact several offences described in the preceding sections under this chapter, are what would be designated contempts in English Law. But over and above those offences, there still remain some which are treated of as contempts, though they do not fall within the category of any offence described in the Code. To such class belong offences such as comments upon a case sub judice,<sup>1</sup> tending to influence the result of proceedings.<sup>2</sup> Comments upon the evidence given in a case while it is still pending, are contempts.<sup>3</sup> So comments in a newspaper with reference to the impending examination of the directors of a banking company in liquidation, to the effect that "if they are compelled to make a full statement of the affairs of the bank, we shall have some interesting revelations" were held to be contempt, in view of the fact, that the newspaper concerned had published a series of articles against the directors previous to the filing of the petition, and they had been inspired by the petitioning shareholder.<sup>4</sup>

2543. So it is contempt to animadvert upon the conduct of a judge in a manner inconsistent with the respect due to him, as where he is charged with having neglected the commonest considerations of prudence and decency and is compared with two of the most notoriously unrighteous judges,<sup>5</sup> or where he is charged with open partiality, malice or vindictive disregard of truth and justice, with cowardly submissiveness to the behests of the executive, or indeed, when the comment ceases to be a fair comment upon the administration of justice, and deteriorates into a libel upon the judge.<sup>6</sup> It is contempt to publish in a newspaper an account of proceedings which, a Judge had decided, should not be disclosed, by determining to hear the case in camera.<sup>7</sup> The intimidation or subornation of persons cited or likely to be cited as witnesses in a case is contempt;<sup>8</sup> so it is contempt in a solicitor of one party to abuse the solicitor of his adversary immediately after leaving the Court, and while they were on their way from the Judge's room to the entrance gate of the building.<sup>9</sup> Of course, the use of violent and abusive language towards a person serving the process of the Court is clearly contempt.<sup>10</sup>

2544. Jurisdiction of High Courts.—Before the enactment of the Contempts of Courts Act<sup>11</sup> it was held that while the High Courts as Courts of Record possessed jurisdiction to punish for contempt of their own Court, they had no jurisdiction to punish for contempt of the inferior Courts.<sup>12</sup> Such jurisdiction is possessed by the High Court of England which it ascribes to the common law.<sup>13</sup> The Contempt of Courts Act, 1926, now extends the same jurisdiction to all the High Courts including the Chief Court.

2545. Other Contempts.—The law on the subject of contempt of Court is partly statutory and partly stated to be supported by common law. The statutes provide for certain specific acts of contempt in ss. 178, 179, 180 and 228; and the refusal to produce a document punishable by s. 175, in all of which cases the Court may either deal with the offender summarily or commit him for trial, or if the Court concerned is a Judge of the High Court, he may try him himself.<sup>14</sup> Apart from these specific acts there may arise other cases of contempt which tend to interfere with or prejudicially affect the trial. The High Courts have been statutorily constituted Courts of Records (s. 1 of Government of India Act, 1915), which implies jurisdiction in them to punish for contempt of themselves.<sup>15</sup>

2546. The question arises whether they possess the power to punish for, contempt of the Courts subordinate to them. The question has been decided in the negative by a Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court,<sup>1</sup> who have limited the Court's jurisdiction to contempt of itself and not extending, at any rate, beyond the proceedings pending in the subordinate Court which might in the ordinary course come before it either for original or appellate trial. But they added that though the assumption of this extended jurisdiction was conceivable on the ground that it was implied, they nevertheless emphasised that their view was an obiter and open to reconsideration.<sup>2</sup>

2547. This omission, has since been made good by an Act<sup>3</sup> enabling the High Court of Judicature to punish contempts of subordinate Courts and to define and limit the powers exercisable by such High Courts and Chief Courts in punishing contempts of Court.<sup>4</sup>

229. Whoever, by personation or otherwise, shall intentionally
 Personation of a cause, or knowingly suffer himself to be returned, Juror or Assessor, empanelled or sworn as a jurymen or assessor in any case in which he knows that he is not entitled by law to be so returned, empanelled or sworn, or knowing himself to have been so returned, empanelled or sworn contrary to law, shall voluntarily serve on such jury or as such assessor, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

2548. Analogous Law.—This section is new, and did not exist in the Bill as originally drafted. It is directed towards punishing false personation of an assessor or juror for which no provision existed elsewhere. The offence consists of causing or suffering to be returned, empanelled or sworn as a juror or assessor to which one knows one is not entitled by law. Persons who are merely exempt from liability to serve as jurors or assessors under section 320 of the Procedure Code are not within the rule, for exemption is a privilege and not a disqualification,<sup>5</sup> so that such persons cannot be punished under this section if they permit themselves to be returned as jurors or assessors.

2550. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of first class.

2551. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused was—
  - (a) returned; or
  - (b) empanelled; or
  - (c) sworn as a jurymen or assessor.
- (2) That he was not entitled by law to be so returned.
- (3) That he intentionally caused or knowingly suffered himself to be so returned etc.
- (4) That he did so by personation or otherwise.
- (5) That he then knew that he was not so entitled to be returned, etc.

Or instead of (3), (4) and (5) prove :—

(3) That he knew that he had been returned, etc., contrary to law.

(4) That he nevertheless voluntarily served in that capacity.

2552. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about—day of—you—intentionally caused (or knowingly suffered) yourself to be returned (or empanelled or sworn) as a juror (or assessor) in case No.—of—tried by—by personating A B when you knew that you were not entitled to be so returned [ (or empanelled or sworn) or you knowing yourself to have been so returned (empanelled or sworn) contrary to law, voluntarily served on such jury (or as such assessor) ], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 229 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

2553. Principle.—The object underlying this section is to prevent the perversion of justice by excluding interested persons from coming forward to serve as jurors or assessors. The former being the sole judges on questions of fact can materially influence the administration of justice, and it may lead to the failure of justice, if in their composition, private interest of partizanship were suffered to have a scope.

2554. Personation of a Juror or Assessor.—The offence of personation of a juror or assessor possesses the features common to other personations,<sup>1</sup> the gist of the offence consisting in the practising of fraud either on the public or on the administration of justice. The section does not punish unauthorized acts, but only acts intentional and designed. It does not punish those who, though exempt from service as jurors or assessors,<sup>2</sup> waive their privilege and permit themselves to be so returned.<sup>3</sup> Nor does it extend to the objections which the accused is permitted to take under section 278 of the Procedure Code. These are cases of personal disqualifications to serve in a case which do not affect the administration of justice, and do not fall within the reason of the rule, which is directed only against one who knowing that he is not entitled by law to serve as a juror or assessor intentionally or knowingly causes or suffers himself to be so returned. Such a case may arise where a person falsely personates a qualified juror or assessor, or where one gives himself out as a juror, though in fact he is not one. In such a case, if it was a case of mistaken impression, there is no offence because there was neither intention nor knowledge. If it was deliberate, law presumes that the representation was attempted or made from corrupt or improper motives—for no other supposition is possible—and it punishes the act accordingly.

2555. The section deals with the fraud of two kinds : (a) that in which the accused had guilty knowledge before he was returned etc. ; and (b) that in which he has guilty knowledge after he had been returned, etc. In the one case, the accused procures his illegal return ; in the other case his return may have been made through an accomplice, and there may then be no evidence of previous knowledge, though the mischief aimed at may be the same. The section, therefore, makes it a crime whether the accused procures a false return or knowingly takes advantage of it.

CHAPTER XII.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO COIN AND GOVERNMENT STAMP.

2556. Topical Introduction.—At the time the Code was enacted, there were numerous coins of several Princes varying in quality and fineness, but the authors of the Code recommended that Government coins should be protected first and then the British Coins. They did not then suggest any measures to protect stamps or currency notes ; but the chapter was afterwards revised to include stamps, which are the subject of the closing sections of this chapter. (ss. 255–263-A).

The Counterfeiting of notes falls under the general heading of forgery of valuable securities. (Ch. XVIII).

230. Coin is metal used for the time being as money, and stamped and issued by the authority of some State or Sovereign Power in order to be so used.
“Coin ” defined.

Queen’s coin is metal stamped and issued by the authority of the Queen, or by the authority of the Government of India, or of the Government of any Presidency, or of any Government in the Queen’s dominions, in order to be used as money; and metal which has been so stamped and issued shall continue to be the Queen’s coin for the purposes of this Chapter, notwithstanding that it may have ceased to be used as money.
“Queen’s Coin.”

- (a) Cowries are not coin.
- (b) Lumps of unstamped copper, though used as money, are not coin.
- (c) Medals are not coin, inasmuch as they are not intended to be used as money.
- (d) The coin denominated as the Company’s rupee is the Queen’s coin.
- (e) The “Farukhabad” rupee, which was formerly used as money under the authority of the Government of India, is Queen’s coin, although it is no longer so used.

2557. Analogous Law.—The whole of this section has undergone a change in consequence of subsequent amendments. The word coin, as originally enacted, was intended to include the metal used for the time being as money. But as the Government call in coins, such coins, it was apprehended, would be excluded. The amendment in 1872<sup>1</sup> was intended to include them also. The other amendment was intended to prevent the counterfeiting of any coin whether issued by the authority of Indian Government, Indian States or a foreign power.<sup>2</sup> Illustration (e) was also added by the same Act.<sup>3</sup> Murshidabad rupees stand on the same footing as Farukhabad rupees.<sup>4</sup>

2558. The definition of “coin” and “Queen’s coin” in this section must, so far as regards this country, be read as subject to the provisions of the Metal Tokens Act<sup>5</sup> which prohibits the making of copper or bronze coins or of any other metal or mixed metal, whether stamped or unstamped, intended to be used as money, except by the authority of the Governor-General in Council.<sup>6</sup> It also declares the making of any such piece in contravention of s. 3, to be a cognizable offence. Section 6 reserves to the Governor-General in Council the power to prohibit or restrict by a notification the bringing by sea or by land into British India any such pieces of metals as are mentioned in section 3. And then follows the following provision:— which may extend to ten rupees.”

“(2) If any person on behalf of a railway administration or on behalf of a local authority, or on behalf of the lessee of the collection of any toll or other import leviable by a railway administration or local authority receive as money any piece of metal which is not such coin as aforesaid, he shall be punished with fine

2559. What “Coin” Now Includes.—As now amended, the word “coin” as here defined does not merely mean the coin current in British India. It includes any coin issued by any State if only it is for the time being used as money. In this sense the term “coin” means only “current coin.” A coin obsolete or no longer in use is not then “coin” within the meaning of this definition. For example, the gold-mohur of the reign of Shah Jahan or silver rupees of that reign are not coins within the meaning of this term, for whatever their face or intrinsic value, they are not money for they cannot be used as money.<sup>1</sup> Now coin may be used as money in one or two ways, either because it is a legal tender, or because its use has become customary. Coins are ordinarily made current by an official proclamation, but a proclamation in general cases is not necessary, and a prosecution for coining need not be proved.<sup>2</sup> If it is legal tender it is a good legal discharge of an obligation; if its use was merely customary, it may not have that effect, but it is nevertheless money if only it is in circulation as a medium of exchange. It is not necessary that it should pass at an absolutely fixed value, but it is necessary that some value should attach to it as coin, as distinguished from the intrinsic value it possesses as a lump of metal.<sup>3</sup> Such are, for example, Kaldar and Jeypur Mohars which are stated to pass current in certain parts of the country.<sup>4</sup> As such, they are “for the time being used as money” however limited the area in which they may have been so used.

2560. The test of a coin is its common usage or notoriety. If the services of a numismatist have to be requisitioned to determine its face value, it ceases to be a coin, whatever value it may otherwise possess. A coin must be capable of being used as money, which implies that it must be accepted, as such, as a medium of exchange and as a general standard of value: one test of whether it is money or not is the possibility of taking it into the market and obtaining goods of any kind in exchange for it.<sup>5</sup> The fact that a shroff would purchase a coin and give an anna or two more for the sake of the impression or design does not make it a coin. For, all old coins possess such value with coin collectors. Under the definition, as here given, it follows that a coin may be no coin, though it may still be a Queen’s coin. For a coin ceases to be a coin if it has ceased to be used as money, though it may continue to be a Queen’s coin as defined in the next paragraph.<sup>6</sup>

2561. What is Included in Queen’s “Coin.”—The word “coin” is a genus of which the “Queen’s coin” is a species limited to the coin stamped and issued by the authority of (i) the Queen, or of (ii) the Government of India, or of (iii) the Government of any Presidency, or of (iv) any Government in the Queen’s dominions. But inasmuch as a Queen’s coin remains as such notwithstanding that it may have ceased to be used as money, and coin must be used for the time being as money, it follows that a Queen’s coin is not necessarily coin, and in this respect the former is a narrower term than the latter. It may then be that a Queen’s coin still remains a Queen’s coin though it ceases to be a coin (§ 2559). For instance, rupees of a certain year withdrawn from circulation cease to be coins within the definition of the term, but their counterfeiting would be punishable under section 232.<sup>1</sup>

2562. The test whether a piece of metal is or is not Queen's coin depends upon whether it is issued by the authority of the King or of the Government of India, or of a Presidency or of any other Government in the King's dominions. It is not necessary that the King's coin should be minted at the Government mint. They may, indeed, be made anywhere, but their issue alone must be authorized by the Government as specified in the section. For example, the Murshidabad rupees of the nineteenth year of the Emperor Shah Alam, known as Sikkah rupees were at one time used with the sanction of the Government of British India for the time being as money—they were then "Queen's coin," within the meaning of this section.<sup>2</sup> Similar Sikkah rupees continued to be struck at the mints at Fatehgarh, Farukhabad, Benares, Saugor and Calcutta till 1835, in the September of which year the East India Company established the English coinage with the head of King William IV in place of the name of the Mogal Emperor and the older issues were then ordered to be suppressed. Such rupees having been issued under the authority of the Government were then Queen's coins, and they remained to be so despite their subsequent suppression.<sup>3</sup>

231. Whoever counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A person commits this offence who intending to practise deception, or knowing it to be likely that deception will thereby be practised, causes a genuine coin to appear like a different coin.

[Counterfeit—s. 28.]

2563. Analogous Law.—The term 'counterfeiting' is here used in the sense in which it is defined in section 28. Counterfeit coin means coin not genuine, but resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for genuine coin, and includes genuine coin prepared or altered so as to resemble or pass for coin of a higher denomination.<sup>4</sup> The money charged to be counterfeited must resemble the true and lawful coin, but the resemblance need not be perfect; but such as may in circulation ordinarily impose upon the world.<sup>5</sup> Thus a counterfeiting with some small variation in the description, effigies, or arms done probably with intent to evade the law, is yet within it, and so is the counterfeiting in a different metal, if in appearance it be made to resemble the true coin.<sup>6</sup> In England, it was at one time provided<sup>7</sup> that it did not amount to counterfeiting, where the imitation of the real coin had not proceeded so far as to fabricate a false coin sufficiently perfect to be circulated. It was so held where the impression of a half-guinea was forged on a piece of gold not round enough to pass current as such.<sup>8</sup> But in this respect law has been since altered, and now the offence of counterfeiting is held to be complete although the coin be not in a state fit to be altered, or the counterfeiting not finished or perfected.<sup>9</sup> It will be seen that these provisions have been incorporated in section 28 of the Code which defines counterfeiting, a term which has been there defined for the purpose of this Chapter.

2564. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

(9) 24 and 25 Vict., c. 99, s. 30.

2565. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused counterfeited, or performed any part of the process of counterfeiting.
- (2) That the thing counterfeited or intended to be counterfeited was a coin.
- (3) That the accused did as in (2) knowingly.

2566. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the——day of——you——counterfeited (or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit——) a coin to wit——(or a King's coin to wit——) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 231 (or s. 232, in case the coin be the King's coin) of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

2567. Counterfeiting Coin.—In order to constitute an offence under this section, it is in the first place necessary that the counterfeiting should be of a coin as defined in the last section. If it is counterfeiting what is not a coin, e.g., a war medal, it is not an offence under this section, which is intended only to protect the currency. Now as the term “coin” is in the last section restricted to apply only to a current coin, it follows that there can be no counterfeiting of an old or obsolete coin, or a coin which though once current has ceased to be so. For instance, there can be no counterfeiting of a coin of the time of the Emperor Akbar,<sup>1</sup> because though once current, they have ceased to be so. The only exception to this rule is that already noticed while discussing the meaning of the term “Queen's coin,” in which case the question of currency is immaterial. Of course, a person who counterfeits a rare old coin and passes it off as a genuine specimen, would be undoubtedly guilty of cheating, only his act is not an offence under this section. In order then to see whether the offence of an accused falls under this section, the Court has first to see whether the coin fabricated was current anywhere ; if it was not, there is no offence under this section. For this purpose it is not necessary that the coin should be a legal tender, for all that is required is that it should be for the time being used as money. Now, as has been already remarked, this may be because it is so declared by Government, or because it is customary. As an example of the latter, may be mentioned the Kuldar and Jeypur Gold Mohurs which, though not a legal tender, are still used as money in certain parts of the country<sup>2</sup> ; so were certain copper pieces struck off by the Nawab of Loharu, which were used by merchants in various parts of the country, though their issue was unauthorized.<sup>3</sup>

2568. As counterfeiting implies intentional deception,<sup>4</sup> it follows that intention to practise deception is the first ingredient of the crime. But how is this intention to be proved? One way of proving it is, from closeness of imitation, as explained in section 28.<sup>5</sup> So where the accused had made in German silver, copies of a Nepalese coin for purposes of ornament and had intended that they should be used with hooks attached, which he had omitted to attach, the Court convicted him of this offence and sentenced him to imprisonment till the rising of the Court.<sup>6</sup> But as pointed out by the Punjab Court, the gist of the offence is the intention to practice deception by making and causing of wrongful loss or wrongful gain which is lacking in coins made merely for ornaments.<sup>7</sup>

2569. Removing Solder from Coins.—A converse case arose where the accused converted certain Kundedar rupees by removing their Kundas or hooks and removed all traces of the hooks, his intention being to restore the rupees to their normal condition. It was held that this was not counterfeiting, since there was no intention to cause wrongful gain or wrongful loss and no practice of deception.<sup>1</sup> Indeed, even where deception is practised, it does not necessarily follow that the intention to deceive was present at the time of counterfeiting. It was so held in a Punjab case, where the accused had in his possession a double pice which he quicksilvered so that it resembled a rupee, and he then delivered it to one K to get it changed as a rupee. If the idea of using the white coin as a rupee was an afterthought the accused might be convicted of abetting K to cheat the person to whom he was sent with the counterfeit rupee.<sup>2</sup> But in view of Explanation 2 since added<sup>3</sup> to section 28, by the Metal Tokens Act, 1889, this view is now no longer tenable, since deception of one kind may be easily turned into a deception of another kind, and therefore the Code makes no distinction between them. But it is always open to the accused to show that the deception he intended to practise was of one kind rather than of the other kind. Such indeed was the defence made by Quadir Baksh, but in view of explanation 2 of section 28, it did not prevail with the Court. It would then seem that in such cases, the thing of paramount importance is the closeness of imitation. The closer the imitation the greater is the presumption of guilt, and though in theory it is always open to the accused to profess his innocence, a stage may arise in the imitation when the Court is irresistibly driven to the belief that the imitation was intended only for the purposes of fraud and not for mere display.

2570. This raises the question how much imitation amounts to counterfeiting.

Quantum of Imitation Necessary.

It is, of course, of the essence of counterfeiting, that the counterfeit must bear some such resemblance to a genuine piece of coin as to show that it was intended to resemble and pass for it though the imitation may be imperfect or the process incomplete.<sup>4</sup> The question, whether the resemblance, in a given case, is such as to amount to counterfeiting, is then a question of fact which the jury are to judge upon the evidence before them—the rule being that the resemblance need not be perfect but such as may in circulation ordinarily impose upon the world.<sup>5</sup> There may be counterfeiting with some small variation in the design, inscription, effigies or arms, done probably with intent to evade the law. So is the counterfeiting in a different metal, if in appearance it be made to resemble the true coin.<sup>6</sup> And the offence may be complete where the counterfeit money is made to resemble coin, the impression on which has been worn away by time, if only the resemblance is such as might very probably be accepted by persons for a good coin.<sup>7</sup>

2571. In fact, the offence consists in the deception, and if one blank piece of metal is so forged as to resemble another which is current as a wrong coin, there is counterfeiting, the want of impression being probably the more conducive to the deception.<sup>8</sup> Counterfeiting may be done as much by forging a new coin of a baser metal, as by sweating or tampering with the genuine coin. The coating of quicksilver given on a piece to make it resemble an eight-anna silver piece, is a familiar example of such counterfeiting. So where a genuine sovereign had been fraudulently filed at the edges so as to reduce the weight by one twenty-fourth part, and to remove the milling entirely, or almost entirely, and a new milling had been added in order to restore the appearance of the coin, the coin was held to be false and counterfeit.<sup>9</sup>

2572. The extraction of gold or silver by the use of acids known as sweating is another method of counterfeiting coins. In all such cases, the coins counterfeited were colourable imitations of the original. Where, however, they are so different in size, shape or design that no one could be ordinarily deceived by the imitation, there is no counterfeiting. For this purpose, the test is the test of the man in the street and not of an expert from the Mint. For those who practise deception do so on the common people who use money as a medium of exchange and the only question in such cases, therefore, is whether they are likely to be deceived by the imitation. Where the current coins are circular discs of stamped metal the imitation must, at least, be round, to amount to counterfeiting. Where, therefore, the impression of money was forged on an irregular piece of metal not rounded without finishing it, so as not to be in a state to pass current, there was held to be no offence though the accused may have actually attempted to pass it in that condition.<sup>1</sup> So a person, fraudulently representing to an ignorant person a metal as being money, could not be said to have attempted to pass a counterfeit coin.<sup>2</sup> In an English case, the accused attempted to pass off a medal for a half-sovereign, which it resembled; on the obverse there was the head of the Queen as in a half-sovereign, but the legend was entirely different. The metal was querled but the querling was round and not square. While a witness had deposed so far, he accidentally dropped the metal and it was lost. There was no evidence as to what it contained on the reverse, but the Court held that there was evidence that the metal resembled a half-sovereign in size, colour and figure.<sup>3</sup>

2573. Where the counterfeiting, crude or perfect, is complete, the question to be considered is comparatively simple. But, somewhat complicated questions may arise where the offence charged is "knowingly performing any part of the process of counterfeiting coin." This evidently means something more than a mere preparation for counterfeiting, such as the collection of tools and materials. It means the reaching of some stage of the process itself, that is to say, a stage which is necessary for the process of counterfeiting. It must be an act immediately connected with the offence, and the accused could have no other object than to commit the offence.<sup>4</sup> The phrase "performing any part of the process of counterfeiting" would have given rise to much comment, but in view of the more general provisions of section 235, the Court felt safer to charge the accused under both the sections and when it is so, the question loses its intrinsic importance, but in such case, the accused must be convicted only under one section.<sup>5</sup>

232. Whoever counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting the Queen's coin, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

2574. Analogous Law.—This section only provides an enhanced penalty for an offence, described in the last section, when it is committed in respect of the Queen's coin. The protection which law gives to the coins of the realm is necessarily greater, and the offence is, therefore, necessarily visited by heavier penalties.

2575. Procedure and Practice.—Like the last section, this offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable and non-compoundable and is triable exclusively by the Court of Session. Separate sentences cannot be passed on a person convicted of this offence and of s. 235, i.e., for counterfeiting King's coin and having in his possession implements and materials used for counterfeiting such coin.<sup>6</sup>

2577. Charge.—The form is set out under the last section (§ 2566).

2578. Counterfeiting King's Coin.—All the elements necessary to establish the offence of counterfeiting, as described in the last section, must be present in a case arising under this section. In addition to this, the coin counterfeited must be shown to be the King's coin. This is not difficult where the counterfeiting is complete, but it may not always be possible where the act only amounts to the performance of any part of the process of counterfeiting. In such a case, the question would be—did the accused intend to counterfeit a coin, and was the coin to be counterfeited the King's coin? Of course, if the coiner is found in possession of his moulds, coining tools and materials, they may be enough to lead to a conclusion as to what was his intention. Otherwise, the only section under which a conviction is possible is section 231.

2579. As has been remarked under the last section, where counterfeiting is not complete, the accused may be charged for performing any part of the process of counterfeiting, or in the alternative for being in possession of coining instruments. In such case, the accused could only be convicted of one or the other of the two offences, and not of both, for if he is convicted under this or the last section, he could not then be convicted under section 235 for having in his possession implements and materials, as the possession of such implements and materials was a part and parcel of the transaction of counterfeiting, for which a second sentence would be illegal.<sup>1</sup>

2580. Analogous Law.—This section and the next deal with the same offence, only the next section provides an enhanced penalty as the coin affected is the King's coin. In this respect, this section bears the same relation to the next as section 231 bears to the last section.

2581. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of first class. In the case of a previous conviction, the Magistrate may have to commit the accused to Session as required by section 348 of the Procedure Code.

2582. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused made, or mended, or performed some part of the process of making or mending the die or instrument, or that he bought, sold or disposed of it.
- (2) That he did so—
  - (a) intending or knowing that such die or instrument might be used for the purpose of counterfeiting coin;
  - (b) or that he knew, or had reason to believe that the same was intended to be used for such purpose.

Queen's coin—s. 230.]

2585. Analogous Law.—The offence in this section is an aggravated form of an offence described in the last section, the aggravating circumstance being that the coin affected is the King's coin. The provisions of this section, as of the last, are taken from an English Statute, the provisions of which will be found set out under the next section.

2586. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

2587. Proof.—All the points mentioned under section 233 must be proved, in addition to which must be proved that the coin counterfeited was a King's coin.

2588. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

“ That on or about the——day of——at——you made (or mended or performed any part of the process of making or mending, or bought or sold or disposed of) a certain die, exhibit——(or instrument) for the purpose of being used (or knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used) for counterfeiting a coin, to wit——(or a piece of King's coin, to wit——), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 233 (or s. 234 if the coin be King's coin), and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2589. Making or Mending Instruments for Counterfeiting King's Coin.—This section is distinguishable from the last in that the instrument relates to the counterfeiting of the King's coin. In such case, there must be something from which the Court may legitimately infer that the instruments were not only so intended, but that they were so designed. The fact that the instrument might conceivably serve some other purpose as well, would then be material, for innocence being presumed, the accused's instrument could not be said necessarily to be for counterfeiting King's coin. On the other hand, if such an instrument is found along with other instruments, the use of which is unmistakable, a different inference would then be justifiable. In an English case, the prisoner was found in possession of a number of puncheons made of iron and steel upon which was impressed the obverse of a shilling together with a number of counterfeit shillings the impression on which was too taint to be compared, but which appeared to have been made with the puncheon found, but which, it was shown, could also be used for other purposes, such as making seals, buttons, metals or other things where such impressions were wanted. It was also shown, that the puncheon without the counter-puncheon or matrix was, by itself, incapable of producing the impression. Moreover, the puncheon impressed the device on a shilling without the letters, but these letters were shown never to be impressed by a puncheon at the Mint. In short, the puncheon, as it was, was insufficient to make a new shilling, though it was sufficient to make an old or base shilling current, and upon this eleven of the judges convicted the prisoner, holding that the absence of the letters did not matter if the instrument impressed, a resemblance, in fact, such as was sufficient to impose on the world.<sup>1</sup>

2590. The fact that the instrument, by itself, and without the aid of other machinery was insufficient to perform any part of the making of a coin is again immaterial, for both under the English Statute as well as under the act, this is unnecessary. A collar is, for example, used in coining for milling the coins, but, in order to do so, the coins must be forced through it by machinery, but it is, nevertheless, a coining instrument, though it has to be used in conjunction with other machinery.<sup>2</sup> But, though an instrument may be by itself insufficient to make a coin, it must be an instrument or a die, and not merely a part of one or the other,

(1) Ridgelay's case, 1 Leach 189.

(2) Moore, 2 C. & P. 205.

nor such as is by itself or in conjunction with other machinery or instrument workable. So where the prisoner was found in possession of a mould of a shilling but which had no channel by which the metal ran, Maule, J., directed an acquittal, holding that it required something to make it a mould.<sup>1</sup> But the terms of this section are wider, and in such a case, there would be certainly a conviction under the next section.

2591. Intention Material.—Neither the last section nor this speaks of intention, but this is assumed in the words which require that the making or mending of a die or instrument should be for the purpose of being used for counterfeiting. An innocent maker of a die or instrument cannot, therefore, be punished under this section. So where the prisoner ordered a die-sinker to sink dies which would impress the obverse of a shilling, representing that the dies were required for counters for two whist clubs, but the die-sinker, entertaining suspicions, consulted officers at the Mint, and upon their seeing no objection executed the order. The dies were afterwards used for counterfeiting coins, but the prisoner who had ordered the dies was alone held to be guilty, the die-sinker being held to be an innocent agent.<sup>2</sup>

235. Whoever is in possession of any instrument or material, for the purpose of using the same for counterfeiting coin, or knowing or having reason to believe that the same is intended to be used for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine ;

and if the coin to be counterfeited is the Queen's coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

2592. Analogous Law.—The provisions of this section, as of the other sections generally, have been taken from the English Law,<sup>3</sup> the present provisions of which as to the offence described and made punishable by this section are as follows :—

“ S. 24. Whoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall be on the party accused), shall knowingly make, or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any puncheon, counter puncheon, matrix stamp, die, pattern or mould, in or upon which there shall be made or impressed, or which will make or impress, or which shall be adapted and intended to make or impress, the figure, stamp, or apparent resemblance of both or either of the sides of any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin or of any coin of any foreign prince, state or country, of any part or parts of both, or either of such sides ; or shall make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or shall buy or sell or have in his custody or possession, any edger, edging or other tool, collar, instrument, or engine, adapted and intended for the marking of coin round the edges with letters, grainings, or other marks or figures apparently resembling those on the edges of any such coin as in this section aforesaid, knowing the same to be adopted and intended as aforesaid ; or shall make or mend or begin or proceed to make or mend, or shall buy or sell or have in his custody or possession, any press for coinage, or any cutting engine for cutting by force of a screw or of any other contrivance round blanks out of gold, silver, or other metal or mixture of metals, or any other machine, knowing such press to be a press for coinage, or knowing such engine, or machine, to have been used or to be intended to be used for or in order to the false making of counterfeiting of any such coin as in this section aforesaid, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than five years<sup>1</sup> or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour and with or without solitary confinement."

2593. The following provisions of an older Statute relates to making or having in possession copper coining tools<sup>2</sup>:—

"Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse, the proof whereof shall be on the party accused, shall knowingly make or mend or begin or proceed to make or mend, or buy or sell or have in his custody or possession any instrument, tools, or engine adopted and intended for the counterfeiting any of the Queen's current copper coin, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years, and not less than five years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement."

2594. These two sections deal with the offences described in the last two and this section, that is (i) of making or selling coining instruments, (ii) when they relate to King's coin, and (iii) of being in possession of any such coining instruments. As will be perceived, the sections of the English Statute are more specific and comprehensive than their abridged paraphrase which forms sections 233—235. But they are both intended to meet the same evil, and the close similarity of the language between the two enactments justifies the interpretation of the one with the aid of precedents settled under the other.

2596. Both under the English Statute as well as under the Code, the offences depend not upon intention but upon knowledge.<sup>5</sup> If A is in possession of coining implements, or makes, mends or sells them to B, knowing that B will use them for illicit coining, A's crime is complete, though A may not have been privy to B's coining.

2597. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should, ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable as well as non-compoundable and it is triable exclusively by the Court of Session, if the offence relates to the King's coin, otherwise, by the Court of Session, or Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of first class. In case of a previous conviction, the accused may be committed to the Court of Session, as provided in section 348 of the Procedure Code. As the offence of counterfeiting coin has the effect of not only defrauding public revenue, but also the public, it should be visited with condign punishment.<sup>6</sup>

- (1) That the accused was in possession of an instrument or material,
- (2) Which instrument or material was for the purpose of using for counterfeiting coin, or King's coin ; or, the accused knew or had reason to believe that the same was intended to be used for that purpose ;
- (3) That the instrument or material was in fact for the purpose of counterfeiting coin, or King's coin.

2599. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

(1) Three years if the offence was committed before the 25th July 1864, see 27 and 28 Vict., c. 47, s. 2.

"That on or about the—day of—at—you were in possession of a certain instrument (or material), to wit—(mention it) for the purpose of using the said instrument for counterfeiting a coin, to wit—(or King's coin, to wit—) (or knowing or having reason to believe that the said instrument was intended to be used for the purpose of counterfeiting etc.) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 235 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session.).

2600. Possession of Coining Tools.—Like the last two sections, this section also punishes a mere preparation as an offence, if the preparation unmistakably points to its being made for counterfeiting coin, or a King's coin, the latter being an offence of much greater severity in accordance with the general policy of the Chapter. The gist of the offence consists in being (i) in possession, (ii) of tools and materials for counterfeit-coining, or (iii) knowing or having reason to believe that the same is intended to be used for that purpose.

2601. What is Possession.—In the first place, there must be possession. The English Statute speaks of possession or custody. But whether it is one or the other, there must be knowledge of its existence, and an intention to exercise power or control over the object possessed. "The mere physical relation arising from the position of the object is insufficient. The possession contemplated is not possession which has never been voluntary; and for the purpose of bringing home to any person the voluntary possession of any object, the mere proof of a fact of which he knows nothing, would be valueless. The section, no doubt, also requires in the accused person intention or knowledge as to the use to be made of the objects in his possession, and these might be implied from the nature of the objects themselves. But before that stage is reached, there must be some circumstances indicating such intention or knowledge as is inseparable from the notion of conscious retention implied in the word "possession." Such indication may arise from the position of the object in a place which is constantly used by the person accused and which could not be overlooked by him, or from the bulk of the object itself, or from any circumstance, such as the looking up of the object, which would point to voluntary and conscious possession.<sup>1</sup> Any other possession would be, as the Roman Jurists remarked, possessio asinina ut asinus sellum—such possession as the ass has of its saddle.<sup>2</sup>

2602. Indeed, it is an accepted doctrine of criminal jurisprudence, that whatever may be a man's civil liability, no one can be held criminally liable on possession, when there is no conscious retention—animus sibi habendi. So speaking of the possession of the stolen property Melville, J., citing from Best's work on Evidence<sup>3</sup> remarked: "In order to raise this presumption legitimately, the possession of the stolen property should be exclusive as well as recent. The finding of it on the person of the accused, for instance, or in a locked-up house or room, or in a box of which he kept the key, would be fair ground for calling on him for his defence; but, if the articles stolen were only found lying in a house or room in which he lived jointly with others equally capable with himself of having committed the theft, or in an open box in which others had access, no definite presumption of the guilt could be made.

2603. An exception is said to exist where the accused is the occupier of the house in which the stolen property is found, who, it is argued, must be presumed, to have such control over it as to prevent anything coming in, or being taken out without his sanction. As a foundation for civil responsibility, this reasoning may be correct; but to conclude the master of a house guilty of felony, on the double presumption, first that the stolen goods found in the house were placed there by him, or with his connivance, and secondly, supposing they even were, that he was the thief who stole them, there being no corroborative circumstances, is certainly treading on the very verge of artificial conviction."<sup>4</sup> Batty, J., applied these observations to the case of a goldsmith prosecuted under this section for being found in possession of a mould, and nine counterfeit rupees. The mould contained an impression of the Queen's head as it appears on a rupee. The room in which it was found belonged no doubt to the accused, but it could have been opened from without, as the door was found to have a slit through which the unfastening of its latch was possible, and the Court thereupon held that though the mould and counterfeit rupees had been recovered from his house, they could not be held to have been recovered from his possession. The same view has been taken in the Punjab, in a case in which the accused was found in possession of a box containing instruments for counterfeiting coin. It appeared that his two other brothers had access to the box, and it was not proved that any property of the accused was in it. It was held that there was no evidence of exclusive possession upon which the accused could be convicted.<sup>1</sup>

2604. Evidence of Possession.—The question whether possession has been sufficiently traced to a person, is a question dependent upon the proved circumstances of each case. In one case, Weeks and two other men and two women were indicted for having in their possession a mould impressed with one side of a half-crown. Weeks was owner of the house which he had occupied for a month, but he was absent when the police raided it. The men attacked the police, whilst the women threw into the fire something, which on examination was found to be a wet mould of a half-crown made of a plaster of Paris. Other materials for counterfeit coining were found in several parts of the house. Thirteen days before, Weeks had passed a bad half-crown, but there was no evidence of its having been made in the mould found in the house. It was held that the evidence as to Weeks' possession was sufficient to justify his conviction.<sup>2</sup>

2605. A somewhat similar view was taken in another case in which on an indictment against the husband, the wife, and a boy, aged ten years, for having in possession a mould on which was impressed the obverse side of a shilling; it appeared that the boy had been apprehended whilst passing a counterfeit half-crown, and on the police going to the house where he said he resided, the husband was found in an upper room, while the moulds and other coining instruments were found in the room below. During the search, the wife came in and destroyed a mould used in counterfeiting shillings. She was found also to possess counterfeit shillings, but her husband had none. It was held by Telford, J., that, as the mould was found in the room occupied by the husband, he must be prima facie presumed to be in possession of what the room contained, but it was only a presumption which might be rebutted, and what the jury had to consider was whether the counterfeiting had been carried on there with his sanction. If they were satisfied that the husband was in possession of the mould, they ought to acquit the wife, as she could not, in law, be said to have any possession separate from the husband; but, if they thought that the criminality was on her part alone, and that he was entirely guiltless of any participation in her conduct, she might be convicted. If they thought she broke the mould to screen him from detection, that would not affect the case. Either husband or wife might be convicted on this evidence, but not both. The fact of a wife attempting to break up coining instruments at the time of her husband's apprehension, if done with the object of screening him, is no evidence of possession. As to the boy, it would be going too far to say that he was in joint possession with either of his parents.<sup>3</sup>

2606. The question whether possession in such case should be presumed against the manager of a joint Hindu family, was decided in the case of a goldsmith and his son who maintained a shop, in a verandah of their house in which were found buried some counterfeit coins. The father was convicted of this offence holding that prima facie the shop was in his possession. There was evidence that the son ordinarily worked in the shop while the father looked after the cultivation;

whereupon the High Court acquitted the father holding that the presumption was rebutted, and that as regards the son who used the shop, he too was acquitted as, being an open verandah, other persons had equal access to it.<sup>1</sup>

2607. The question whether possession includes also custody, separately mentioned in the English Statute, may perhaps be disposed of on the ground that the term "possession" is wide enough to include both, the only difference being that in the one case the possession is for and on behalf of another, whereas in the other case it is on behalf of one's own self. So the English Statute runs—"Where the having any matter in the custody or possession of any person is mentioned in this Act, it shall include not only the having it by himself in his personal custody or possession, but also the knowingly and wilfully having it in the actual custody or possession of any other person and also the knowingly or wilfully having it in any dwelling house, or other building, lodging, apartment, field, or other place, open or enclosed, whether belonging to or occupied by himself or not, and whether such matter shall be so had for his own use or benefit, or for that of any other person."<sup>2</sup>

2608. Coining Instruments.—The section does not specify any instrument or material as falling into the class of coining instruments, but these have been sufficiently specified in the English Statute quoted before (§ 2592). A mould<sup>3</sup> or a puncheon<sup>4</sup> upon which is impressed the inverted device of a shilling, a collar of iron for making the edges of coin,<sup>5</sup> a press for coinage<sup>6</sup> are all coining implements. These are sui generis coining instruments, but any instrument may become a coining instrument, if there is evidence to show that it was used as such. For instance, a galvanic battery is by itself an indifferent thing, but if it is found with white metal and other things plainly indicating that it was used for coining, and it appeared that counterfeit coins were electro-plated before they were put in circulation, it would, under the circumstances, become a coining instrument.<sup>7</sup> So, as regards materials, plaster of Paris or clay or any like substance cannot by itself be designated a coining material. But if there is evidence that it had been used for making moulds, they become materials for counterfeit coining, within the meaning of this section.

2609. Knowledge Essential.—No man can be convicted of this offence on the mere ground that he was in possession of coining implements, unless it is established at the same time that he had knowledge of their character.<sup>8</sup> The evidence may, of course, be direct or presumptive, but it must be sufficient to convince the jury, not merely that the accused knew that the instruments were counterfeiting instruments but also that they were being used or intended to be used for that purpose.

236. Whoever, being within British India, abets the counterfeiting of coin out of British India, shall be punished in the same manner as if he abetted the counterfeiting of such coin within British India.

[British India—s. 15      Counterfeiting—s. 28      Abets—s. 107      Coin—s. 230]

2610. Analogous Law.—This section follows the analogy of many others in which the Code punishes abetment of the commission of an offence in foreign territory. This section enacts that in such a case, the abettor shall be punished in the same way as if he had abetted the offence of counterfeiting coins in British India. But in such a case, abetment in British India must be complete. As abetment may consist merely of instigation, and one who instigates a resident abroad to counterfeit a coin, whether the King's or any other coin, would be guilty of this offence. Thus, if A in British India were to order the manufacture of nickel rupees, say in Germany and a manufacturer in Germany were to make or refuse to make them, A may still be guilty of abetment under section 110 or section 116, as the case may be. But, a person in Germany, instructing A in the process of counterfeiting, could not be punished under the Code, nor is there any section under which A could be punished. It will at best be a mere preparation, and not an attempt, nor indeed, could the abettor in Germany be punished under the section. But any person, irrespective of his nationality, would be liable under this section provided that he was in British India at the time of abetment.

2611. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

2612. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused abetted.
- (2) That the abetment related to the counterfeiting of coin.
- (3) That the counterfeiting of coin was to be out of British India,
- (4) That at the time of such abetment, the accused was in British India.

2613. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the——day of——at——being in British India you abetted one A B resident in——out of British India in the counterfeiting of coin by——(specify the act) and you thereby committed an offence under section 236 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

237. Whoever imports into British India, or exports therefrom, any counterfeit coin, knowing or having reason to believe that the same is counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Import or export of counterfeit coin.

[British India—s. 15. Reason to believe—s. 26. Counterfeit—s. 28. Coin—s. 230.]

2614. Analogous Law.—This section is again taken from the English Law<sup>1</sup> the provisions of which against importing and exporting of counterfeit or light coins are as follows :—

“ S. 7. Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused) shall import or receive into the United Kingdom from beyond the seas any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than 5 years<sup>2</sup> or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.

Importing counterfeit coin from beyond the seas.

“ S. 8. Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall be on the party accused) shall export, or put on board any ship, vessel, or boat for the purpose of being exported from the United Kingdom any false or counterfeit coin, resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of misdemeanour, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.”

Exporting counterfeit coin.

2615. This section includes all cases of exporting counterfeit colonial coins. S. 19 of the Statute similarly prohibits the bringing in or receiving into the United Kingdom of counterfeit coins. Other sections<sup>3</sup> similarly penalize purchase or sale of counterfeit gold and silver coins for lower value than their denomination.

(1) 24 and 25 Vict., c. 99.

and 28 Vict., c. 47, s. 2.

(2) Three years if the offence was committed before the 25th July 1864; see 27

(3) E. g., S. 6.

2617. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused imported into or exported from British India some coins.
- (2) That such coins were counterfeit.
- (3) That the accused then knew or had reason to believe that they were counterfeit.

2618. Traffic in Counterfeit Coins.—This section is directed against the illicit traffic in counterfeit coins. If counterfeiting alone had been visited by high penalties it would set a high premium on counterfeiting abroad and from where such coins could be safely imported. In such a case the mischief would remain the same, namely, the debasement of the currency with its attendant loss to the state. The offence as here described consists of (i) importing or exporting any (ii) counterfeit coin (iii) knowing or having reason to believe that the same is counterfeit. The question whether a person has imported or exported counterfeit coin must then depend upon whether it was done with guilty knowledge or belief. A person receiving or paying out in counterfeit coin without being aware of its true nature, may have done so, because he was himself deceived into accepting it, or because he may have received or paid it in the ordinary course of business. Such receipt and payments are then not within the penal visitations of the section. At the same time, if there was the guilty knowledge, the offence is complete without any actual uttering.

2619. Charge.—The charge under this and the next section should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the——day of——you imported into (or exported from)——a place in British India, certain pieces of coins (or King's coins) to wit——(mention the coins) then knowing (or having reason to believe) that the same were counterfeit, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 237 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or High Court).

238. Whoever imports into British India, or exports therefrom, any counterfeit coin which he knows or has reason to believe to be a counterfeit of the Queen's coin, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[British India—s. 15. Reason to believe—s. 26. Counterfeit—s. 28. Coin—s. 230.]

2620. Analogous Law.—This section is the same as the last, only it provides the enhanced sentence on account of the coins imported or exported being counterfeit King's coin. In other respects the two sections are identical, and require the same proof.

239. Whoever, having any counterfeit coin, which, at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew to be counterfeit, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers the same to any person, or attempts to induce any person to receive it, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Fraudulently—s. 25. Counterfeit—s. 28. Possessed—s. 235.]

2621. Analogous Law.—This and the next four sections ending with section 243 deal with the uttering of counterfeit coins, the offence varying according to the time when guilty knowledge was possessed by the utterer. The authors are admittedly indebted for this distinction to the French Code which appears however to have been also adopted in the Bomaby Code.<sup>1</sup>

2623. Both under this as well as the next section, the possession of any number of coins would constitute only one offence, and the accused could not be tried for as many offences as there are coins. So again, a person having, say, four counterfeit coins in his possession and uttering only one of them, cannot be separately convicted under section 240 respecting the one coin, and under section 243 of the Code regarding the other three, because an offence under this and the next section implies prior guilty possession. In such a case, if the accused had uttered the four coins together, there would not have been a second conviction and sentence, and it would be anomalous that uttering one coin instead of four, should expose him to a severer sentence: "The possession of all four was, as a crime, an indivisible act, which was the complement of the uttering in constituting the offences under section 240, and a conviction having been obtained under that section, the guilty possession should not have been made the distinct crime. If such separations were allowable, there might be a conviction for the possession of each rupee. The physical acts, though capable of separate existence and perception, coalesce, when coincident, in time and space and purpose."<sup>2</sup> If two prisoners are indicted for uttering a counterfeit shilling, and it appears that one of them entered the shop and uttered the bad money whilst the other awaited him outside the shop and having had other bad coins, they may be both convicted of uttering, as the facts sufficiently prove that both the possession and the uttering were joint. So if in such a case both entered the shop and one utters a bad coin, which is not accepted, it is not necessary to prove with certainty the very coin uttered if all the coins, found in their possession were bad.<sup>3</sup>

- (1) That the accused was in possession of a coin,
- (2) Which was counterfeit;
- (3) That he then knew it to be counterfeit ;
- (4) That he delivered it to another, or attempted to induce him to receive it ;
- (5) That the delivery was made fraudulently or that fraud may be committed.

2625. Charge.—The charge under this and the next section should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the—day of—at—you—had a piece of counterfeit coin (or King's coin) Exhibit—in this case (or certain pieces of counterfeit coins) which at the time you became possessed of it (or them) you knew to be counterfeit, and which you fraudulently (or with intent that fraud may be committed) delivered to A B [or attempted to induce A B to receive it (or them)] and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 239 (or section 240) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

2626. Principle.—This section and the next deal with professional dealers in false coin, that is to say, those who receive it knowingly as false, and fraudulently palm it off as true.<sup>4</sup> The recipient need not, however, necessarily be innocent, for if a dealer in false coins employs an accomplice to palm off a false coin, he commits the same crime as if he had himself committed the imposition. The object of the section is to penalize all fraudulent circulation of base coin, whether it be through an accomplice or a stranger. In this respect the professional and the casual utterer of false coin differs, as the former is subject to the penalties of this and the next section, whereas the casual offender is made subject to the more lenient penalties of s. 241. The distinction between these two classes of offenders was explained by the authors to be very material. A professional utterer is a helpmate of the professional coiner and is, therefore, an offender in equal degree. A casual receiver of false coins may, however, be himself imposed upon; but, if he tries to retrieve his loss by passing it on to another, he would naturally be guilty of dishonesty, but which the authors regarded as comparatively venial, and hence the difference in punishment.<sup>1</sup>

2627. Professional Dealer in False Coin.—This section is admittedly directed against professional dealers in false coins,<sup>2</sup> the distinction between such persons and a casual offender punishable under section 241 being that, while the former knew of the coin being counterfeit at the time they became possessed of it, the latter was innocent then, though he too acquired the same knowledge before he passed it off. The distinction between the two offenders is not a radical one; it is a distinction of degrees, the previous knowledge of the one showing greater deliberation which the latter presumably lacks. This section is, it will be observed, in other respects also strongly worded. For instance, it requires not only knowledge of counterfeit coin at the time of possession, but it further requires that its delivery should be made fraudulent, or with intent that fraud may be committed.

2628. In the first place, then, there must be knowledge that the coin received is counterfeit, and that knowledge must have been possessed with the possession of the coin. But how is the possession of such knowledge to be proved? Direct proof is not possible always, nor if possible, is it always available. The usual mode of proving such knowledge is by circumstances, and it is then necessarily a matter of inference.<sup>3</sup> It has been held that for this purpose, evidence of other acts, other than the one complained of, is admissible, not for the purpose of showing the probability of the accused's crime, but as making the possession of guilty knowledge in the particular case charged, more probable.<sup>4</sup> In one case such evidence was objected to, but the Court allowed it observing: "As to the cases put by the prisoner's counsel of uttering bad money, I by no means agree in their conclusion, that the prosecutor cannot give evidence of another uttering on the same day, to prove the guilty knowledge. Such other uttering cannot be punished until it has become the subject of a distinct and separate charge; but it affords strong evidence of the knowledge of the prisoner that the money was bad. If a man utter a bad shilling, and fifty other bad shillings are found upon him, this would bring him within the description of a common utterer, if the indictment do not contain that charge, yet these circumstances may be given in evidence on any other charge of uttering, to show that he uttered the money with a knowledge of its being bad."<sup>5</sup> As Heath, J., in the same case said: "the charge in this case puts in proof the knowledge of the person, and as that knowledge cannot be collected from the circumstances of the transaction itself, it must necessarily be collected from other facts and circumstances."<sup>6</sup>

2629. So it is provided in the Indian Evidence Act:—

"A is accused of fraudulently delivering to another person a counterfeit coin, which, at the time when he delivered it, he knew to be counterfeit:

"The fact that, at the time of its delivery, A was possessed of a number of other pieces of counterfeit coin, is relevant.

"The fact that A had been previously convicted of delivering to another person as genuine a counterfeit coin knowing it to be counterfeit, is relevant."<sup>7</sup>

2630. But this is not all. For knowledge may be inferred as much from the accused's previous conviction and possession of other false coins, as from other facts to which reference is equally legitimate. For instance, evidence of the facts, that the accused had uttered other false coins previously to the act in question, was always held to be admissible, whether the other coins were or were not of the same description,<sup>1</sup> but it was at one time a moot question whether the same rule applied to coins uttered subsequently to the act charged.<sup>2</sup> But it is now settled that the same rule must apply to all acts whether prior or subsequent, and whether in each case the coins uttered are of the same or of different denominations.<sup>3</sup> Indeed, for this purpose, the Courts have admitted not only evidence of acts and facts, but even of his general demeanour, as tending to show that what the accused did or attempted to do, was known to him to be criminal.<sup>4</sup>

2631. But, while this is the rule, it is obviously subject to some limits both as to time and circumstances, beyond which evidence of other similar acts would not be permitted.<sup>5</sup> In England, it is left to the Judge's discretion to determine these limits, but, probably, his discretion would be exercised, having regard to the probative value of the evidence tendered. An act done in the remote past, and after which the accused has led a moral life could scarcely throw much light on his knowledge, and such evidence would in most cases be excluded. On the other hand, if that act was of a series of acts so connected together as to amount to the evidence of a system, it is then not only admissible, but will be an essential factor in determining the question of his knowledge. In one case, the Court inferred such knowledge from the fact of the accused being a goldsmith and therefore, as one who could not have been deceived into receiving base coins mistaking them for genuine ones.<sup>6</sup> Of course, the section only requires evidence of guilty knowledge of the spuriousness of the coins, at the time of receiving possession of them. Direct proof of fabrication is not required.<sup>7</sup>

2632. In addition to the contemporaneous knowledge of the character of the coins, the accused must deliver the same fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed. The former implies delivery to an innocent recipient, while the latter implies delivery to an accomplice, who in turn delivers it fraudulently to one whom he can induce to accept, or if he refuse them his act is an attempt to induce that person to receive it, within the meaning of the third clause of the section. For the purpose of this section, it is not necessary that the coin should have been accepted. All that is necessary is that it should be either delivered, or that an attempt to induce any person to receive it should be made. An offer made but refused, is then sufficient to complete the offence. It was so held in an English case, decided under 2 Will. IV, c. 34, s. 7, the words of which were "uttering and putting off a counterfeit coin," and in which the prisoner went into a shop and asked to purchase some coffee and sugar, and in payment of the same he put on the counter a counterfeit shilling which the shopkeeper refused to accept as a bad one. The prisoner thereupon left the shop leaving both the coffee and sugar as well as the shilling behind him. It was held that the charge of uttering and putting off had been made out.<sup>8</sup> In another case, the accused had purchased five apricots for six pence, and offered in payment a bad shilling. The fruiterer put it in his mouth to bite it to try its goodness, and he returned it as bad. The accused then gave him another and yet another shilling with the same result. He told the fruiterer that they were all good coins, but in fact, they were bad ones. He was held to be guilty of uttering false coins.<sup>9</sup>

known to be counterfeit. The words "receive" and "delivery" imply payment in discharge of an obligation. They do not refer to a mere change of custody. For instance, if a person hands false coins to another to keep for him awhile, he cannot be held to have delivered them to him nor could the other be said to have received them. It was, indeed, so held in a case in which two vagrants, the prisoner and another purchased some liquor and drank it at the doorway of the shop. One of them then entered the shop for some more liquor, but the shopkeeper mistook him for a thief, and shut the door upon him and called out for his arrest. On this he ran off and, meeting one Mungli, put two rupees and eight annas in his hands, telling him to keep them for him. The coins were found to be counterfeit, and he was prosecuted under this section for delivering them to Mungli but this conviction was annulled on appeal, the Court holding that such delivery was not contemplated by or punishable under the section.<sup>1</sup>

2634. False Coiner Excluded.—As remarked before, this section only applies to a professional utterer of coins, and not to one who is a false coiner. As remarked by Turner, J., : "The words 'which, at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew to be counterfeit' point to a person other than the coiner, that is to say, the person who procures or obtains or receives counterfeit coin. It is against such person that the section is directed."<sup>2</sup> Consequently, a person who both makes false coins and delivers them to others cannot be convicted both under s. 231 as well as this section. His offence only falls under s. 231.<sup>3</sup> In a case, the accused went into a village and purchased sweetmeats from one K, for which he paid with a counterfeit two anna piece: he also delivered another counterfeit two anna piece to R in payment for some milk. On discovering the fraud, K pursued the accused, and aided by two others arrested him. On being pursued the accused threw away a yellow bag which was found to contain a mould, an instrument called a "jugi" used for keeping up a draught in a file, a file, and some white metal, all evidently instruments or materials used for counterfeiting coin. It was held that the only conviction possible was under s. 235, and not under the next section, which is applicable only to the actual coiner, as there was nothing to show under what circumstances the accused became possessed of the counterfeit of the Queen's coin.<sup>4</sup>

240. Whoever, having any counterfeit coin which is a counterfeit of the Queen's coin, and which, at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew to be a counterfeit of the Queen's coin, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers the same to any person, or attempts to induce any person to receive it, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

2635. Analogous Law.—This is an aggravated form of the offence described in and punishable under the last section, the aggravating circumstances being that the coin in respect of which the offence is committed is the King's coin. In other respects, the two sections are identical, and require the same points to be proved. For a further commentary under this section reference should be made to the discussion under the last section.

2636. Procedure, Proof and Charge.—See last section (§§ 2622-2625)

2637. Uttering King's Coin.—The essential elements of an offence under this section are exactly those discussed under the last section. Shortly stated, they are (i) that the offence here described applies only to a professional dealer, and not to a coiner who is otherwise liable; (ii) in order to hold a person liable under this section, there must be evidence of knowledge at the time of possession, and there must then be (iii) fraudulent delivery or delivery with intent that fraud may be committed, or an attempt to induce any person to receive it, added to which, must be proved the fact (iv) that the coin possessed and delivered was the King's coin.

241. Whoever delivers to any other person as genuine, or attempts to induce any other person to receive as genuine, any counterfeit coin which he knows to be counterfeit, but which he did not know to be counterfeit at the time when he took it into his possession, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine to an amount which may extend to ten times the value of the coin counterfeited, or with both.

2638. Analogous Law.—In discussing the scope of s. 239, the distinguishing feature of this section has been already set out (§ 2632). As has been there stated, this section refers only to a casual, as opposed to a professional, utterer of base coins. As such he differs from the latter in not knowing that the coin was counterfeit at the time when he took it into his possession. But, of course, he had that knowledge at the time of uttering it, for if he had not, he would then be wholly innocent, and the question about the applicability of this section could not then arise.

2639. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable as well as non-compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

2640. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused delivered or attempted to deliver a coin to another.
- (2) That the said coin was counterfeit.
- (3) That the accused delivered or attempted to deliver it as genuine.
- (4) That at the time of delivery he knew it to be counterfeit<sup>1</sup>

2641. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the—day of—at—you—delivered to A B as genuine (or attempted to induce A B to receive as genuine), a coin Ex.—which was counterfeit, and which you then knew to be counterfeit though which you did not know to be counterfeit at the time when you took it into your possession, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 241 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

2642. Casual Delivery of False Coin.—The only palliating feature which this offence, as distinguished from that punishable under s. 239, presents is that the guilty knowledge as to the spuriousness of the coin dawns on the accused after he comes into possession of it. It may then be that he had been himself made the victim of an imposition, and not brooking the loss he has so sustained, he becomes anxious in his turn to palm off his bad money so received to another. By so doing he brings himself within the grip of the law but it is a discriminating law, and regards his offence as mitigated by his previous innocence.

2643. Of course, the gist of the crime consists in delivering the coin as genuine when he knew it to be counterfeit. Such knowledge may have been acquired by him at any time prior to the delivery, but it must have been after the accused had himself received the money. He may have found it out only a moment afterwards, but, if he had not known of its spuriousness at the time he took it, he is entitled to the reduced penalty provided under this section. In ordinary cases this will be assumed, and in any case, it will be on the prosecution to prove that a given case falls under the graver penalties of s. 239 rather than of this section.<sup>1</sup> The evidence under this section must be given to show that, at the time the accused delivered, or attempted delivery of the base coin, he was aware of its spuriousness, and that being so aware, he passed it or attempted to pass it off as genuine.<sup>2</sup> And in this respect the section requires that he must know it to be counterfeit. If, then, he merely suspected it as such, or for that matter believed it to be so, he could not be convicted whatever may have been his turpitude in passing off suspicious coins.<sup>3</sup>

As to what constitutes delivery, see s. 239 (§ 2633).

242. Whoever, fraudulently, or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of counterfeit coin, having known at the time when he became possessed thereof that such coin was counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable for fine.

Possession of counterfeit coin by person who knew it to be counterfeit when he became possessed thereof.

[Fraudulently—s. 25.      Counterfeit—s. 28.      Possession—s. 235.]

2644. Analogous Law.—This section and the next are again the same, the next section possessing the same aggravating feature, namely, that the coin possessed is a spurious King's coin. In other respects, the two sections are identical. The commentary under this section must be read as applicable to the next section.

2645. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable as well as non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session or a Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of first class.

2646. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That accused was in possession of a coin.
- (2) That that coin was counterfeit,
- (3) That he was in possession of it with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might be committed.<sup>4</sup>
- (4) That at the time he became possessed of it, he knew it to be counterfeit.<sup>5</sup>

To which may be added the following aggravating circumstance justifying a conviction under the next section:—

- (5) That the coin in question was a King's coin.

2647. In connection with the question of knowledge, the following provision of the Indian Evidence Act is noteworthy:—

“(e) A is accused of fraudulently having in his possession counterfeit coin which he knew to be counterfeit.

“He offers to prove that he asked a skilful person to examine the coin, as he doubted whether it was counterfeit or not, and that that person did examine it, and told him it was genuine.

“A may prove these facts for reasons stated in the last preceding illustration.”

The reasons there stated are that, though these statements are admissions, they are admissible as being explanatory of conduct influenced by facts in issue.

2648. Charge.—The charge under this or the next section should run thus:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“That on or about the——day of——at——you fraudulently (or with intent that fraud might be committed) were in possession of Ex.——being counterfeit coins (or King's coins), knowing at the time when you became possessed of the same that they were counterfeit, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 242 (or s. 243) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

2649. When is Possession of a Counterfeit Coin Criminal.—This section dispels the common erroneous notion that the possession of all counterfeit coins is reprobated by law under its sanction. As this section enacts, all possession is not criminal. To be criminal, it must be possession with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might thereby be committed. Then, again, the section couples with this requirement another, namely, that only possession of the coin which the person in possession knew to be counterfeit at the time he became possessed of it is criminal. Any other possession is not. For instance, a person may obtain possession of counterfeit coin without knowledge that it is counterfeit. He may then discover its true nature. He may preserve it to palm it off upon another on a suitable opportunity offering. Here he is in possession with intent that fraud may be committed. But his possession is not criminal, because he had no knowledge of its spuriousness at the time he came into possession of it.

2650. Again, suppose a person knowingly purchases spurious coin for a collection. As he does not intend to commit fraud thereby, his possession is not criminal, though the coins in his possession are counterfeit. It is thus evident that, in order to amount to a crime, the two circumstances above specified must both co-exist, and it is from that time that his possession assumes a criminal complexion. A coin collector may, for example, change his mind and intend to pass his coins off as genuine coins. His possession then becomes criminal the moment there is this change in his intention. How this change is to be proved, is another matter. But the fact remains that he cannot be punished for his possession of counterfeit coin, unless there is proof of that intention.

243. Whoever, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of a counterfeit coin, which is a counterfeit of the Queen's coin, having known at the time when he became possessed of it that it was counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Possession of Queen's coin by person who knew it to be counterfeit when he became possessed thereof.

2651. Fraudulent Possession of King's Coin.—This section is one aggravated form of the last section, under which its scope and operation will be found discussed.

2652. Procedure and Practice.—see § 2645.

244. Whoever, being employed in any mint lawfully established in British India, does any act, or omits what he is legally bound to do, with the intention of causing any coin issued from that mint to be of a different weight or composition from the weight or composition fixed by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Person employed in mint causing coin to be of different weight or composition from that fixed by law.

[British India—s. 15. Legally bound—s. 43.]

2653. Analogous Law.—This section visits with its drastic penalties pilfering of bullion used at the mint for the coinage of money. The provisions of the section naturally extended only to those who are employees at the mint, whatever may have been their duties and responsibilities. The object to the section is to ensure the conformity of the coinage to its exact legal requirements, and its unauthorized debasement by those who may have an opportunity to tamper with its purity, composition and weight. But the very exactness in composition of metals is practically unattainable, and the Indian Coinage Act consequently provides a remedy up to a certain extent,<sup>1</sup> beyond which a coin ceases to be a good coin. The section is not, however, intended to punish any unintentional aberration in the minting of coins. It only deals with intentional acts and omissions, the intention being to vary the weight or composition of the coin. This is enough to constitute the offence, and it is not necessary to prove dishonesty or fraud.

2655. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused was employed in any mint lawfully established in British India.
- (2) That, as such, he did some act or omitted what he was legally bound to do.
- (3) That the act or omission was with the intention of causing any coin issued from that mint to be of a different weight or composition from the weight or composition fixed by law,
- (4) That it will have the effect as in (3).

2656. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you being employed as——in the——mint lawfully established in British India did an act, to wit——(specify the act) or omitted what you were legally bound to do (specify the omission) with the intention of causing the coin issued from the said mint to be of a different weight or composition from the weight or composition fixed by law, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 244 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on said charge."

2657. Debasement of Coin by Mint Employees.—In the first place, it is not necessary for an offence under this section that in consequence of the act or omission of the accused, the coin should have been actually debased or issued as such. The accused may perpetrate a fraud, and it may be detected before any mischief is done. The offence is then complete apart from any injury his act may have caused. All that the section requires is that (i) the accused must have been an employee of a Government mint, and (ii) as such he must have done some act or omission, (iii) with the intention of varying the weight or composition of any coin issued from the mint. As such, there can be no offence if the act or omission was due to mere carelessness, indolence, or negligence. In order to amount to this offence it must have been intentional, and the intention must be as stated in the section. A person who mixes more alloy than is permitted under law, may be guilty of merely negligence, or his act may have been designed. In the latter case, he will be guilty of this offence.

245. Whoever, without lawful authority, takes out of any mint, lawfully established in British India, any coining tool or instrument, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Unlawfully taking
from mint.

[British India—s. 15. Coining tool or Instrument—s. 235.]

2658. Analogous Law.—The offence consists in the unauthorized removal of tools from a mint, whether by an employee of the mint or an outsider. Intention is no part of the definition of the offence and need not be proved. But upon the proof of intention must depend the punishment. The object of the offence is to prevent the theft of mint tools for the purpose of using them for counterfeiting coin.

(1) Indian Coinage Act (III of 1906), ss. 5, 6.

2660. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused took out of a mint lawfully established in British India,
- (2) A coining tool or instrument.
- (3) That he did so without lawful authority.

2661. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the——day of——at——you took out of the mint lawfully established in British India at——Exhibit——which was a coining tool or instrument without lawful authority, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 245 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

2662. Unlawful Removal of Coining Tools.—The offence here described consists in taking out of any mint any coining tool or instrument. Merely concealing it on one's person with a view to take it out of the mint, would not be an offence under this section, though it would be an attempt, for which the accused might be punished under section 511 of the Code. Of course, in order to constitute an offence, the thing removed must be proved to be a coining tool or an instrument, and it must necessarily belong to or be in possession of the mint.

246. Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly performs on any coin any operation which diminishes the weight or alters the composition of that coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Fraudulently or dishonestly diminishing weight or altering composition of coin.

Explanation.—A person who scoops out part of the coin and puts anything else into the cavity, alters the composition of that coin.

[Dishonestly—s. 24.

Fraudulently—s. 25.]

2663. Analogous Law.—The previous of this and the next section correspond with those of 2 Will. 4 c. 34, s. 5 as modified by, and re-enacted in 24 and 25 Vict., c. 99, s. 4 : “Whoever shall impair, diminish or lighten any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, with intent that the coin impaired, or diminished, or lightened may pass for the Queen's current gold or silver coin shall, in England and in Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term exceeding fourteen years, and not less than five years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.”

2664. Sections 2 and 16 of the Indian Coinage Act<sup>1</sup> are also relevant, inasmuch, as they give the meaning of “deface” and the authority by whom the defaced coin may be destroyed.

2664-A. The next two sections then provide for the return or payment of the coin so cut to their owner, in cases (a) and (b) of section 16 last quoted, the effect of the provision being that the person cutting shall pay for them, unless he believes that the coin has been fraudulently defaced. It is then explained that sweating is deemed to amount to fraudulent defacement.<sup>2</sup> This and the next section deal with the tampering of a coin either by sweating or other means which diminishes its weight or alters its composition. Where the coin in respect of which the offence is committed is the King's coin, the offender is subject to the aggravated penalty provided in the next section.

2665. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

(1) Act III of 1906.

(2) Similar provisions are made in England by 24 & 25 Vict. (c. 99. s. 26).

2666. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused performed an operation.
- (2) That the thing on which operation was performed was a coin.
- (3) That the operation was performed fraudulently or dishonestly.
- (4) That it diminished its weight or altered its composition.

To which may be proved the following aggravating circumstance, calling for enhanced punishment under the next section :—

- (5) That such coin was the King's coin,

2667. Charge.—The charge under this and the next section should run thus'

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——yau fraudulently or dishonestly performed on the coin, Exhibit——(or on the King's coin, Exhibit——) an operation which diminished its weight (or altered its composition), and yon thereby committed an offence under section 246 (or 247) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

2668. Sweating Coins.—It is an offence to fraudulently or dishonestly diminish the weight or alter the composition of a coin. As for the weight, it must, of course, to some extent, be diminished by wear, but two per cent. has been fixed: to be the maximum diminution so possible.<sup>1</sup> Any greater reduction in weight must then be prima facie fraudulent. It does not, however, necessarily follow that any coin may be diminished to that extent with impunity, for it a new coin shows that diminution in weight, it may be presumed to have been made fraudulently or dishonestly. The question whether the diminution in weight in any case was made fraudulently or dishonestly, is a question of fact depending on the age of the coin, the diminution suffered and the signs of operation which it may bear on its surface.

2669. It will be noted that both under this as well as the next section, the offence is confined to performing an operation, so that it is not enough to show that the accused had such a coin in his possession, nor is it necessary to show that as such he had uttered it. What is required in evidence is that it was the accused who had performed the operation. Persons who are found in possession of such coins, may, however, be punished under the provisions of sections 250-254.<sup>2</sup> The section has, again, no application to gilding, silvering, etc., of a coin so as to give it the appearance of a coin of a higher denomination. Such offence is punishable by section 248 or 249.

247. Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly performs on any of the Queen's coin any operation which diminishes the weight or alters the composition of that coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Dishonestly—s. 24.      Fraudulently—s. 25.      Coin—s. 230.]

2670. Analogous Law.—Except that the coin here is the King's coin, the offence is in other respects exactly the same as that described in the last section, the commentary on which should be read as a commentary under this section.

2670-A. Procedure and Practice.—see § 2665.

248. Whoever performs on any coin any operation which alters the appearance of that coin, with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Coin—s. 230.]

2671. Analogous Law.—This section refers to an operation performed on a coin which, without reducing its weight or altering its composition, alters its appearance, by giving to it the presentment of a coin of a different higher denomination. The quick-silvering of a pice so as to give it the appearance of an eight-anna silver piece, is an example of such an operation.

(1) Indian Coinage Act (III of 1906) s. 21 (c).      (2) Mehtab Rai, 48A, 603.

2672. The provisions of this and the next section are the same, except that the coin in the next section is a King's coin, which calls for the higher penalty there provided. The following provisions of the English Statute<sup>1</sup> refer to the same offence :—

“S. 3. Whosoever shall gild or silver, or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold or silver, or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over or colour any coin whatsoever resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin; or shall gild or silver, or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold or silver or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over or colour any piece of silver or copper, or of coarse gold or coarse silver or of any metal or mixture of metals respectively, being of a fit size and figure to be coined, and with intent that the same shall be coined into false and counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin; or shall gild, or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold, or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over or colour any of the Queen's current silver coin, or file or in any manner alter such coin, with intent to make the same resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current gold coin; or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold or silver, or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over, or colour any of the Queen's current copper coin, or file or in any manner alter such coin, with intent to make the same resemble or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, shall in England and Ireland be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than five years—or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.”

2674. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused performed an operation.
- (2) That the operation was performed on any coin.
- (3) That it altered the appearance.
- (4) That he did so with the intention that the altered coin should pass as a coin of a different description.

To which may be proved the following aggravating circumstance :—

- (5) That the coin in question is a Queen's coin.

2675. Charge.—The charge under this and the next section should run thus :—

“I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the——day of ——at——you performed an operation on the coin Exhibit——(or King's coin) which altered the appearance of the said coin, with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 248 (or section 249) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

2676. Altering Appearance of a Coin.—It is an offence under this section to alter the appearance of a coin, if the alteration was made with the intention that the coin shall pass as a coin of a different description. Fraud or dishonesty are not then expressly a part of this definition, though they are necessarily implied in the intention, the presence of which alone makes the act criminal. That intention must be to convert a coin of a lower denomination into one of a higher denomination. Uttering is not necessary, the offence being complete the moment the alteration is made with the intention aforesaid.

2677. The operation which alters the appearance of the coin must be one which does not diminish its weight or alter its composition. If this is effected as well, the accused may be liable under either of the last two sections. But is he liable under both? It is apprehended not, for the intention being one, the offence is also single, whatever may have been the alteration.

2678. The question whether what is done was sufficient to alter the appearance, must be judged in the light of whether the alteration effected is sufficient to make the coin passable for a coin of different denomination. If it is done so as to be able to deceive no one, it cannot be said to have been done with that intention. In other words, in such cases the intention must be judged by the result likely.

2679. The offence only punishes those who perform the alteration—those who are merely found in possession of such coins, or those who deliver it with knowledge that it is counterfeit, are not punishable under this section, though they do altogether not escape unpunished.”<sup>1</sup>

249. Whoever performs on any of the Queen’s coin any operation which alters the appearance of that coin with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Altering appearance of Queen’s coin with intent that it shall pass as coin of different description.

[Queen’s coin—s. 230]

2680. Analogous Law.—This section is exactly the same as the last, except that the coin altered is the King’s coin, for which the section provides the higher penalty.

2681. Procedure and Proof.—The procedure and practice applicable to this case is the same as for an offence punishable under the last section. (§ 2673) The points requiring proof are the same, except that the coin altered should be proved to be the King’s coin.

2682. Charge.—The form of charge is set out under the last section (§ 2675).

250. Whoever, having coin in his possession with respect to which the offence defined in section 246 or 248 has been committed and having known at the time when he became possessed of such coin that such offence had been committed with respect to it, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers such coin to any other person, or attempts to induce any other person to receive the same, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Delivery of coin possessed with knowledge that it is altered.

Coin—s. 280.]

2683. Analogous Law.—This section and the next go together. They must both be compared to sections 239 and 240 to which they correspond. As those sections deal with professional dealers in counterfeit coins, so these sections deal with professional dealers in coin counterfeited in the manner described in s. 246 or 248. The next section is the same except that the coin possessed is the King’s coin. In both cases it is a part of the offence that there must have been both possession with knowledge, and delivery fraudulently, or with intent that fraud may be committed. The absence of delivery reduces the offence to that described in s. 252, or section 253 if the coin delivered was the King’s coin.

2684. Procedure and Practice.—The offences described in this and the next section are cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. They are both non-bailable as well as non-compoundable, and are triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

(1) Possession, ss. 252, 253; delivery, s. 254.

2685. Proof.—The points requiring proof in offences under this and the next sections are :—

- (1) That the coin in the case was one in respect of which an offence under s. 246, or 248 had been committed.
- (2) That the accused was in possession of it.
- (3) That he then knew that any of the said offences had been committed.
- (4) That he delivered it to some other person, or attempted to induce him to receive the same.
- (5) That he did so fraudulently, or with intent that fraud may be committed.

2686. Charge.—The charge under this, and the next section should run thus :

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the——day of——at——you had in your possession a coin Exhibit——(and which was the King's coin) with respect to which the offence defined in section 246 (or section 248) of the Indian Penal Code had been committed, and having known at the time when you became possessed of the said coin, that such offence had been committed with respect to it, you fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivered such coin to A B (or attempted to induce the said A B to receive the same), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 250 (or section 251) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

2687. Fraudulent Dealing in Altered Coins.—The Court recognizes two great sub-divisions of counterfeit coins : those which are wholly fashioned to resemble the real coins, and those which are real coins defaced or altered. Professional dealers in either case are subject to the same punishment, though the Code allows them the choice of sections under which they might be convicted. The essential elements in each case are the same, viz., Possession of guilty knowledge at the time of possessing the coin—, and its delivery with intent to defraud or with intent that fraud might be committed. In this respect, though the section is different, the offence is the same as is punishable under section 239 or 240. But in order to bring it more clearly within its purview it would be necessary to prove that the knowledge was of the fact that the process of counterfeiting adopted was that described in section 246 or section 248. This may be proved directly or, as is more often the case, indirectly by proof of circumstances from which an inference may be legitimately drawn that the accused could not but have known that the coin he was receiving had been tampered with, in the manner indicated in those sections.

251. Whoever, having coin in his possession with respect to which the offence defined in section 247 or 249 has been committed, and having known at the time when he became possessed of such coin that such offence had been committed with respect to it, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers such coin to any other person or attempts to induce any other person to receive the same, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Delivery of Queen's coin possessed with knowledge that it is altered.

[Fraudulently—s. 25.      Coin—s. 230.]

2688. Analogous Law.—This section is just the same as the last with the aggravated fact superadded that the coin possessed is the King's coin, for which the section prescribes the higher penalty. For the rest of the commentary, see under the last section.

2689. Meaning of Words.—“And shall also be liable to fine”: This does not mean that the infliction of fine is imperative. All it means is that the sentence of fine is optional and if passed the accused shall be liable to pay it.’

252. Whoever fraudulently, or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of coin with respect to which the offence defined in either of the sections 246 or 248 has been committed, having known at the time of becoming possessed thereof that such offence had been committed with respect to such coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Possession of coin by person who knew it to be altered when he became possessed thereof.

[Possession—s. 235.]

2690. Analogous Law.—This section and the next correspond to ss. 242 and 243 respectively. They, in fact, bear the same relation to those sections as the two last preceding sections bear to sections 239 and 240. In comparison with sections 250 and 251 these sections are lighter, because while in those sections the offender has taken an advanced step towards imposition by passing the coin in transit, under this section and the next, there is only possession, beyond which the accused may not dare to venture.

2691. Procedure and Practice.—Offences under this and the next section are both cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. They are both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and are triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class.

2692. Proof.—The points requiring proof under this and the next sections are :—

- (1) That the accused was in possession of a coin.
- (2) That it was a coin with respect to which the offence defined in section 246 or 248 had been committed.
- (3) That the accused knew of it when he became possessed of the coin.
- (4) That he was in possession of the coin with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might be committed.

2693. For a general commentary on this section, see under ss. 242, 250.

253. Whoever fraudulently, or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of coin with respect to which the offence defined in either of the sections 247 or 249 has been committed, having known at the time of becoming possessed thereof that such offence had been committed with respect to such coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Possession of Queen's coin by person who knew it to be altered when he became possessed thereof.

2694. Analogous Law.—This section provides a higher punishment for the offence described in the last section, owing to the fact that the coin altered was the King's coin. In other respects, both as to the procedure and proof, the offence is that described in the last section, to the commentary on which reference must be made for more particular information.

2695. Procedure and Practice.—See § 2691.

254. Whoever delivers to any other person as genuine or as a coin of a different description from what it is, or attempts to induce any person to receive as genuine, or as a different coin from what it is, any coin in respect of which he knows that any such operation as that mentioned in sections 246, 247, 248 or 249 has been performed, but in respect of which he did not, at the time when he took it into his possession, know that such operation had been performed, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine to an amount which may extend to ten times the value of the coin for which the altered coin is passed, or attempted to be passed.

Delivery of coin as genuine which, when first possessed the deliverer did not know to be altered.

2696. Analogous Law.—This section generally corresponds to section 241 of the Code, the commentary on which might be usefully read as a part of the commentary on this section.

2698. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused delivered to any other person, or attempted to induce him to receive—
- (2) A coin, with respect to which any such operation as is mentioned in ss. 246-249 had been performed.
- (3) That the accused delivered, etc., the coin as genuine, or as a coin of a different description to what it is.
- (4) That he then knew that the operation mentioned in (2) had been performed with respect to it.

2699. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the——day of——at——you delivered to A B (or attempted to induce the said A B to receive) as genuine a coin, Exhibit——(or as a coin of a different description to what it is), in respect of which you then knew that an operation such as is mentioned in section 246 (or sections 247, 248, or 249) of the Indian Penal Code, to wit——had been performed, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 254 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

2700. Innocent Possession but Guilty Delivery.—As remarked before this offence is the same as is described in and is punishable under section 241 of the Code. There is in each case innocent possession to start with. Knowledge that the coin is counterfeit then supervenes. Then there arises the desire to palm it off upon another and thus avert the loss which it might otherwise entail on the possessor. This offers some temptation to commit the crime, and law recognizes it in measuring the degree of punishment here provided. There is, of course, criminality born of knowledge that the coin was one upon which an illegal operation described in sections 246, 247 had been performed; without such knowledge there would be no offence. Possessing the knowledge, the accused is guilty of imposition upon whomsoever he utters or attempts to utter, as genuine, what is, in fact, and which he knows to be a base coin. The section speaks of delivering as genuine what is spurious, or as a coin of one description when it is a coin of another description, but which had been subjected to an operation described in any of the sections viz., 246-249. A mere delivery of one coin for a coin of another description is, when it is not a mistake, not an offence under this section. For instance, a person may try to palm off a double pice for an English penny, or an eight anna silver piece for an English shilling. He may induce another to accept the one for the other, and he may thereby cheat, and be liable to the penalty attaching to cheating, but he cannot be held punishable under this section. The gravamen of the crime under this section is setting current altered and defaced coins with the knowledge of their alteration and defacement. It is no doubt cheating, but wherein the accused is seconded by the altered appearance of the coin.

255. Whoever counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting, any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A person commits this offence who counterfeits by causing a genuine stamp of one denomination to appear like a genuine stamp of a different denomination.

2701. Analogous Law.—The rest of the sections in this chapter deal with offences relating to the revenue stamps of Government. Their provisions correspond to those of 54 and 55 Vict., c. 38, s. 13, which deals with the same matter. This section is an echo of section 241 which deals with the same offence as applicable to coins. The counterfeiting of the modern stamps is not an easy matter, for stamps are made on a paper specially prepared and water-marked and the impressions they bear are the outcome of elaborate machinery. The offence here described is, therefore, likely to remain a dead letter, but as a necessary part of the Code it is necessary, providing as it does for a contingency, however remote, which may conceivably occur, and which the absence of a penal provision may encourage.

2703. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused counterfeited, or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting.
- (2) That the counterfeiting, etc., was of a Government revenue stamp.

2704. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you counterfeited (or knowingly performed a part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit——) a certain stamp, issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, to wit——and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 255 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

2705. Counterfeiting of Government Stamps.—The word "stamp" has been used here in its generic sense as denoting anything which is a paper token of the payment of a certain charge, tax or revenue. It includes the stamps payable as Court-fee as well as those payable to the post office,<sup>1</sup> and the forest department of Government. Stamps are either adhesive or non-adhesive. The former are, ordinarily, those used in judicial work, Post and Telegraph offices, the Forest and other Revenue Administrations of Government. Non-adhesive stamps are used for the execution of assurances, the engrossing of plaints and appeals and for other similar purposes. They all, however, fall into the general category of stamps issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

2706. A stamp is an impression upon paper, parchment or any material used for writing, made by Government, mostly for the purpose of revenue. As such, counterfeiting a stamp is a forgery, for the act of forgery consists in the making of a false document or writing. It makes no difference whether an entirely new document is construed, or whether an old one is altered so as to have a different effect.<sup>2</sup> Indeed, the offence here described, has been so described in English law, and in the Statute<sup>3</sup> dealing with it. Counterfeiting, like forgery, implies an imitation of the genuine article. There must, then, be at least some attempt at imitation. The dropping of a blot on the portion of a stamp indicating its value, even if intended that it may be mistaken for a stamp of higher denomination cannot be held to constitute counterfeiting.<sup>4</sup>

2707. Other terms used in the section must be interpreted in the light of the remarks made under sections 28 and 231.

256. Whoever has in his possession any instrument or material for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting any stamp issued by the Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Possession—ss. 27, 235.]

2708. Analogous Law.—This section corresponds to section 235, and has, so far as regards the Government stamps, the same object in view as that section has as regards coins.

2709. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

2710. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused had in his possession an instrument or material.
- (2) That the said instrument or material was for the purpose of being used, or knowing, or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used for the purpose of counterfeiting a Government stamp.
- (3) That the stamp to be counterfeited was one issued by the Government for revenue.
- (4) That the instrument or material was so usable.

2711. Possession of Counterfeiting Instruments or Materials.—The gist of this offence is the same as of s. 235, namely, the prevention of counterfeiting by meeting the would-be counterfeiter at the gate. In each case, the mere possession of such tools is not an offence, unless the possession was (a) for the purpose of being used for counterfeiting, or (b) knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be so used. In this respect, the provisions of this section are narrower than those of the English Post Office Act which says that “a person shall not make or, unless he shows a lawful excuse, have in his possession, any die, plate, instrument or material for making any fictitious stamp.”<sup>1</sup> Of course there is a very material difference between “without lawful excuse” and “with guilty knowledge,”<sup>2</sup> and consequently, it has been held in England in a case decided under s. 7 (c) of the Post Office Protection Act, that it was an offence for a person to be in possession of a die for making a false stamp known to be such to its possessor, however innocent the use that he intended to make of it. Such a possession would be possession “without lawful excuse” though it would not be possession “with guilty knowledge.”<sup>3</sup> In this case, the proprietor of a newspaper circulating among stamp-collectors and others, had caused a die to be made for him abroad, from which imitations or representations of a current colonial postage-stamp could be produced. The only purpose for which the die had been ordered by him, and was subsequently kept in his possession, was for making upon the pages of an illustrated stamp catalogue, or newspaper called “The Philatelists’ Supplement,” illustrations in black and white, and not in colours, of the colonial stamp in question, this special Supplement being intended for sale as a part of his newspaper. The Metropolitan Magistrate, who referred the case to the Judges, found as a fact that the accused had “lawful excuse” in fact and the question then was whether it afforded a lawful excuse in law. It was held that a mere bona fide possession was no lawful excuse in law in a matter, where the statute absolutely forbade possession of a die for making any fictitious stamp. Nor was there any other excuse for it, for there can be no excuse for conscious possession of a die for making a fictitious stamp.<sup>4</sup>

2712. It is evident that if such a case came up for decision under this section the verdict would be very different, for, by the very definition of “counterfeit” the intention to practise deception or knowledge that deception is likely to be thereby practised is essential. But in that case though the accused could not be convicted under this section, he would still be liable to a conviction under s. 263-A (c) for the language of that section is exactly identical, to the English Statute. Indeed, its provisions were inserted in the criminal law by all States who were parties to the Post Congress held at Vienna where a resolution for the suppression of counterfeit stamps was mutually agreed upon, in terms which have since found a place in the penal legislation of all the States concerned. An instrument for forging stamp need not be any more perfect than an instrument for counterfeiting coin. It is not necessary that it should produce a finished stamp by a single impression, or that it should make an entire impression. If it was necessary for counterfeiting, it may be a clumsy but passable instrument, and is sufficiently an instrument for the purpose of this section.<sup>1</sup>

257. Whoever makes or performs any part of the process of making, or buys or sells or disposes of, any instrument for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Making or selling instrument for counterfeiting Government stamp.

[Reason to believe—s. 26. Stamp—s. 255. Government—s. 263-A]

2713. Analogous Law.—This section is an adaptation of s. 234, and the two sections mutatis mutandis deal with the same offence. One who makes, buys or sells a counterfeiting instrument, knowing that it is intended to be used for forging stamps, is guilty of abetment. As such, he may be dealt with as an abettor under the general provisions of the Code. But this section provides a specially drastic penalty applicable to him.

2715. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused made or performed any part of the process of making or buying or selling or disposing of an instrument ;
- (2) That the said instrument was intended to be used for the purpose of counterfeiting a Government revenue stamp ;
- (3) That the accused did as in (1) for the purpose of the instrument being used or knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used as in (2) ;
- (4) That the instrument was one which could be so used.

2716. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the——day of——at——you made [or performed any part of the process of making (or bought or sold or disposed of)] an instrument, Exhibit——for the purpose of being used (or knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used) for counterfeiting a stamp, to wit——issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 257 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

2717. Making or Selling Instruments for Forging Stamp.—It has already been stated before, that in order to fall into the category of an instrument intended to be used for the purpose of counterfeiting a stamp there must be something on the face of the instrument to suggest that the instrument was so serviceable. An instrument which is an ordinary tool of a mechanic does not, of course, fall within the description of a counterfeiting instrument ; such an instrument must be one specially designed for or adapted to counterfeiting a stamp. A die or an engraved plate is such an instrument. A person who performs any part of the process of making such an instrument is guilty of this offence, (a) if it was made for the purpose of being used, or (b) he knew, or (c) had reason to believe that it was intended to be used for the purpose of counterfeiting a Government revenue stamp. A person who suspected foul play, but was assured of the legitimate purpose for which it was intended, would not be punishable under this section, though he may have made or mended a counterfeiting instrument. For instance, suppose a person believed to be an accredited agent of a Native State were to commission one to make a die for making a revenue stamp, and the die so made was intended to be used for counterfeiting Government stamp, the die-sinker could not be punished under this section, for the element of criminality was wanting.

258. Whoever sells, or offers for sale, any stamp which he knows or has reason to believe to be a counterfeit of any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Sale of counterfeit Government stamp.

[ Reason to believe—s. 26.]

2718. Analogous Law.—The seller of counterfeit Government revenue stamps is comparable to a dealer in counterfeit coin punishable under s. 239 of the Code. The gist of the offence lies in making money out of counterfeit stamps, the sale being reprobated only when the seller knows or has reason to believe that the stamp he is selling is counterfeit. But, if there was no sale, but only a mortgage, would it be an offence under this section? It would seem not, for there is no reason to suppose that the word “sale” has been used to include a pledge, though the result may, in each case, be the same.

2720. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused sold or offered for sale;
- (2) That the thing sold or offered for sale was a stamp;
- (3) That such stamp was a counterfeit of a Government revenue stamp;
- (4) That the accused then knew, or had reason to believe that the stamp was counterfeit.

2721. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“That on or about the——day of——at——you sold (or offered for sale) a stamp, Exhibit——which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be counterfeit of the stamp——(mention it) issued by the Government for the purpose of revenue, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 258 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

259. Whoever has in his possession any stamp which he knows to be a counterfeit of any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, intending to use, or dispose of the same as a genuine stamp, or in order that it may be used as a genuine stamp, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Having possession of counterfeit Government stamp.

[ Possession—ss. 27 and 235.

Stamp—s. 235.

Counterfeit—s. 28. ]

Government—s. 263-A.]

2722. Analogous Law.—This section corresponds to s. 243, and deals with the same offence as applicable to counterfeit stamps.

2724. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused had in his possession a stamp;
- (2) That it was a counterfeit of a Government revenue stamp;

(3) That the accused knew it;

(4) That he had it in his possession intending to use or dispose of the same as a genuine stamp, or in order that it may be used as a genuine stamp.

2725. Charge.—The charge should run thus :

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

"That on or about the—day of— you were in possession of a stamp, Exhibit— which you knew to be a counterfeit of a stamp, to wit— issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, intending to use (or dispose of) the same as a genuine stamp, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 259 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

2726. Possession of Counterfeit Stamps.—Mere possession of counterfeit, whether coin or stamp, is not an offence in the Code. It becomes an offence when the possession is a mere prelude to an intended imposition upon the public, which may be practised by using it as a genuine stamp, or disposing of it to another as counterfeit stamp who was to pass it off or use it as a genuine stamp. The section only applies to a person other than a forger who is punishable under s. 255.<sup>1</sup>

260. Whoever uses as genuine any stamp, knowing it to be a counterfeit of any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Using as genuine a Government stamp known to be counterfeit.

[Counterfeit—s. 28.]

2727. Analogous Law.—The using of a counterfeit as a genuine stamp corresponds to the delivery of a counterfeit coin as a genuine one, which is punishable under s. 254. The intention, in each case, is the same, namely, practice of imposition by use of false tokens.

2729. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused used stamp;
- (2) That it was counterfeit;
- (3) That it was counterfeit of a Government revenue stamp;
- (4) That he used it with knowledge that it was counterfeit;
- (5) That he used it as a genuine stamp.

2730. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

"I (name and office of Magistrate etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That on or about the—day of—at—you used as genuine stamp, to wit— knowing it to be counterfeit of any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 260 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

2731. Use of Counterfeit Stamp.—In order to make a person liable under this section for use of counterfeit for a genuine stamp, there must be evidence of knowledge that he knew it to be counterfeit at the time of using it. Such knowledge may be brought home to him by the very appearance of the stamp, or it may be a fact which the prosecution will have to establish by independent evidence. There can, however, be no offence under this section, unless the stamp used is shown to be counterfeit. For instance, a cancelled stamp is not a counterfeit stamp, so that a person using it cannot be held liable under this section, though, in that case, he may be liable under section 262. So when a person used an anna revenue stamp as a one rupee stamp and smudged the letters indicating its true denomination, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section because the stamp used was not counterfeit.<sup>1</sup> Again, the accused must have "used" the stamp: the fact that he had affixed it as a preliminary to using it would not bring him within the penalty, for it is the use and not a mere preparation that is punishable under this section. In such a case, the accused might be dealt with under the last section, but it will be even then difficult to hold that in spite of his abstention from using it, he had intended to use it: but intention may be inferred aliunde.

261. Whoever fraudulently, or with intent to cause loss to the Government, removes or effaces from any substance, bearing any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, any writing or document for which such stamp has been used, or removes from any writing or document a stamp which has been used for such writing or document, in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing or document, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Fraudulently—s. 25.

Document—s. 29.]

2732. Analogous Law.—This section may be compared with sections 246 and 248 which deal with the alteration and defacement of a coin.

2733. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

2734. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the stamp was a Government revenue stamp;
- (2) That the accused—
  - (a) removed or effaced any writing or document on which such stamp had been used, or
  - (b) removed from any writing or document a stamp which had been used for such writing or document, in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing or document;
- (3) That he did so fraudulently, or with intent to cause loss to the Government, or in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing or document.

2735. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the—day of—at—you fraudulently (or with intent to cause loss to the Government) removed (or effaced) from any substance bearing any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue any writing, (or document) for which such stamp had been used or removed from any writing (or document) a stamp which had been used for such writing (or document), in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing (or document), and, thereby committed an offence punishable under section 261 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

2736. Principle.—This section deals with two distinct acts: (a) removal of a writing from a stamp, and (b) removal of a stamp from a document. It again postulates two intentions: (i) the intention to defraud some one not necessarily the Government, and (ii) intention to defraud no one but merely to cause loss of revenue to Government. The removal of a writing may be effected without interfering with the stamp, as where a person changes the date of its issue and thus brings it within the limitation fixed for the refund allowable on unused or spoilt stamps. The dropping of a blot with the same object would scarcely come within the meaning of "removing or effacing the writing"<sup>2</sup> though the words appear to be wide enough to reach such mischief.

(1) Shuroop Chunder Das, 2 W. R. 65 (66).

(2) Shuroop Chunder Doss, 2 W. R. 65.

2737. The removal of a stamp from a document is not per se an offence. But it is an offence to remove it with the intention of using it over again on a different writing or document. The removal of a receipt stamp from an acknowledgment with the object of using it as a postage stamp is an example of such an offence. The offence is complete with the removal. Its re-use constitutes an offence punishable by the next section.

2738. In all such cases, the intention to cause loss to Government is manifest. But the commission of the offence may not have been intended to defraud Government, and in that case, the removal of the stamp or the writing must be shown to have been done fraudulently, that is to say, it must have been done to defraud some one, not necessarily the Government. But in each case, there must be either fraud or loss of Government revenue. But whether it is fraud or loss, it must be clearly inferable from the act, or it must be proved. It cannot be assumed.<sup>1</sup>

262. Whoever fraudulently, or with intent to cause loss to the Government, uses for any purpose a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, which he knows to have been before used, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Using Government stamp known to have been before used.

2739. Analogous Law.—The last section deals with the fraudulent removal of a stamp. This section deals with the fraudulent use of it. The Code treats the latter a little more leniently than the former for the one paves the way for the other.

2740. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

2741. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused used a stamp ;
- (2) That it was a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue ;
- (3) That it had once been so used ;
- (4) That when the accused used it he knew that it had been previously used ;
- (5) That in using it over again he acted fraudulently or he intended to cause loss to the Government.

2742. Principle.—The essential element of criminality in this section is the intent to defraud or cause loss to the Government, which must be proved and cannot be assumed.<sup>2</sup> Such proof was held to be wanting in a Bombay case, in which the accused had affixed to his private letter a used service postal stamp. The facts of this case are not reported, and such facts as are given in the judgment do not support the conclusion the learned Judges appear to have held to follow as a matter of course. A person may use a used postal stamp fully aware that the post office will not treat his letter as duly stamped. He could not, then, intend to cause loss to the Government. But, if the mark of its previous use is so faint as may elude a cursory examination, the accused might well have intended that the stamps he had affixed would pass muster, in which case it is difficult to see why he should not be held guilty. Of course, in such a case, there must be evidence that the accused had affixed the stamp, or that, at any rate, it had been affixed under his direction.

263. Whoever fraudulently, or with intent to cause loss to Government, erases or removes from a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, any mark put or impressed upon such stamp for the purpose of denoting that the same has been used, or knowingly has in his possession, or sells or disposes of, any such stamp from which such mark has been erased or removed, or sells or disposes of any such stamp which he knows to have been used, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

2743. Analogous Law.—There can obviously be no corresponding section relating to coin. It deals with three offences:—

(a) Erasing marks of cancellation, (b) Knowingly possessing, or (c) Disposing of such stamps.

2745. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

I. As to erasure—

- (1) That the stamp in question was issued by Government for the purpose of revenue;
- (2) That it had been so used;
- (3) That it bore a mark or impression denoting that it had been so used;
- (4) That the accused removed or erased such mark or impression;
- (5) That he did so with intent to defraud or cause loss to Government.

II. As to possession—

Prove points (1) to (3) and further:—

- (4) That the mark of impression had been removed;
- (5) That the removal was done with intent to defraud or cause loss to the Government;
- (6) That the accused knew of it;
- (7) That the accused was in possession of such stamp.

III. As to disposal—

Prove further:—

- (8) That the accused sold or disposed of any such stamp.

2746. Principle.—As before remarked, this section deals with offences of three kinds: (a) erasure of marks of cancellation, (b) possession of a stamp so erased, (c) sale or disposal of such stamps. In any case, there must be intention or knowledge—intention to defraud or cause loss to Government, or knowledge that the erasure had been made with that intention. The stamp must be a stamp issued by the Government for revenue, though the erasure need not be of a mark put on or impressed by the authority of Government. The mark or impression to denote that a stamp had been used may be a word such as “cancelled,” or it may be any device not necessarily intelligible except to those conversant with the departmental rule. For instance, the mark of cancellation adopted by the post office in the case of a postal stamp is the impression of the name and date stamp, but the erasure of which will be equally an offence under this section. Judicial stamps are ordinarily punched, in which case no erasure or removal of the mark is possible. In that case, there can be no offence under this section.

2747. The second branch of the section deals with the possession or disposal of such stamps, that is to say, stamps from which the marks of cancellation have been fraudulently removed. The offence requires that the possession or disposal should be with the knowledge of the fraudulent erasure. In any other case, a person may be an innocent recipient. That his possession was innocent will, then, be presumed, and it is on the prosecution to shew that he had the knowledge to render his possession or transfer criminal.

263-A. (1) Whoever—

Prohibition of fictitious stamps.

(a) makes, knowingly utters, deals in or sells any fictitious stamp, or knowingly uses for any postal purpose any fictitious stamp, or

(b) has in his possession, without lawful excuse, any fictitious stamp, or

(c) makes or, without lawful excuse has in his possession any die, plate, instrument or materials for making any fictitious stamp, shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

(2) Any such stamp, die, plate, instrument or materials in the possession of any person for making any fictitious stamp may be seized and shall be forfeited.

(3) In this section “fictitious stamp” means any stamp falsely purporting to be issued by Government for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage or any facsimile or imitation or representation, whether on paper or otherwise, of any stamp issued by Government for that purpose.

(4) In this section and also in sections 255 to 263 both inclusive, the word “Government” when used in connection with, or in reference to, any stamp issued for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage, shall, notwithstanding anything in section 17, be deemed to include the person or persons authorized by law to administer executive Government in any part of India, and also in any part of Her Majesty’s dominions or in any foreign country.

2748. Analogous Law.—This section is the same as section 7 of the English Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884<sup>1</sup> and was added to the Code by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1895<sup>2</sup> in consequence of the resolution of the International Postal Congress held at Vienna on 20th May, 1891,<sup>3</sup> in which it was agreed to make an organized attempt to prohibit the growing traffic in fictitious stamps, the use of which on postal articles posted from abroad involved the post office in much loss and inconvenience.<sup>4</sup>

2750. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

That the accused knowingly —

- (a) Made, altered, dealt in or sold any fictitious stamp,
- (b) Or he knowingly used a fictitious stamp for any postal purpose,
- (c) Or had in his possession without lawful excuse any fictitious stamp,
- (d) Or made or, without lawful excuse, had in his possession, any die, plate or instrument or materials for making any fictitious stamp.

2751. Principle.—This section was added in 1895, and its terms are identical with those of section 7 of the English Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884. As such, cases decided under that section may be referred to for the elucidation of words which are common to them. For example, the possession of a die made abroad by the proprietor of a newspaper though for the innocent purpose of embellishing his stamp catalogue was held to be penal and offering no lawful excuse within the meaning of section 7 of the English Post Office Protection Act.<sup>5</sup> The working of the section—depends upon the proper understanding of the two terms "knowingly" and "without lawful excuse." The former has a recognized place in the vocabulary of the Code; the latter requires some discussion. Now the phrase "lawful excuse" does not mean the same thing as "lawful authority." "Excuse," said Willes, J., "is either an authority or a reasonable belief in authority."<sup>1</sup> But excuse is something more and, sometimes, something different from a reasonable belief in authority.

2752. As Grantham, J., observed: "If a person ignorantly bought a fictitious stamp, it would be hard that he should be punished and made liable to a fine, because his knowledge was not sufficient to enable him to know whether it was good or bad, and that, I think, would be a lawful excuse. Why? Not because the man believed that he had authority to have it, for he could not believe that he had authority to have a fictitious stamp in his possession, simply because he had been taken in the purchase of it; he might, however, say that he wished to excuse himself for having the stamp, because he did not believe that it was fictitious, but believed it to be genuine: that seems to me to be an excuse in law, and, therefore, would be a 'lawful excuse.'"<sup>2</sup> "The fact that a person's motive was innocent is immaterial. He may make fictitious stamps for the purpose of curiosity or display an antiquarian interest, but, nevertheless, he brings himself within the mischief of the section, for he has no lawful excuse for his possession, that is to say, no excuse which law considers sufficient to merit exoneration from criminal liability."<sup>3</sup>

CHAPTER XIII.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

2753. Topical Introduction.—This chapter does not require for its working any fixed and immutable standard of weights and measures, nor in fact has such a standard been yet striven for or attained in this country. It is sufficient for the purpose of the chapter, that the weights and measures current in a locality should be fraudulently deviated from. The offence, in short, consists in the fraud practised by making a person believe that a weight and measure is what in reality it is not. The offence consists in cheating by using false weights and measures, which carry with them the semblance of public authenticity. In England, the use of false weights and measures has been, from early times, regarded as an offence against the common law. So if a person measured corn in a bushel and put something in the bushel to fill it up, or measured it in a bushel short of the stated measure, he was indictable.<sup>1</sup> The offences of using false tokens, whether they be false coins, false stamps, false weights and measures or false trade-marks are all parts of the generic offence of cheating, against which extensive provisions have been made by the Municipalities and Local Boards, by regulating the weights and measures and for verifying and stamping them. In such cases, the use of unauthorized weights and measures is also prohibited and punished. But whether it is a charge for using unauthorized weights and measures, or for an offence under any section of this chapter, the underlying principle is the same, only in the one case cheating is apprehended, in the other case it is to be proved. A police officer in charge of a police-station possesses the power to inspect or search for any weights and measures which he has reason to believe to be false, and if they are so found, to seize them.<sup>2</sup>

2754. In England, the weights and measures are regulated by a Statute of that name,<sup>3</sup> The Statute<sup>4</sup> fixes imperial standards of measures, and a bronze bar and a platinum weight deposited in the Standard Department of the Board of Trade in the custody of the warden of the standards are declared to be the standard yard and standard pound for the United Kingdom. The unit or standard measure of capacity for liquids and dry goods are declared to be the gallon, containing ten imperial standard pounds weight of distilled water weighed in air against brass weights, with the water and the air at the temperature of sixty-two degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, and with the barometer at thirty inches.<sup>5</sup> In using an imperial measure of capacity, the same should not be heaped, but should either be stricken with a round stick or roller, straight and of the same diameter from end to end or if the article sold cannot from its size or shape be conveniently stricken it should be filled in all parts, as nearly to the level of the brim as the size and shape of the article will admit.<sup>6</sup> The Statute prohibits under a penalty the use of any weights and measures other than those so legally authorized, and for the periodical verification of which the Board of Trade and local administrations are made responsible.<sup>7</sup> It then goes on to enforce the use of just weights and measures by penal provisions quoted under corresponding sections in the sequel.

2755. These provisions of the English Statute closely correspond with the sections dealing with false weights and measures, and cases decided thereon are therefore instructive.

264. Whoever fraudulently uses any instrument for weighing which he knows to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

2756. Analogous Law.—This section corresponds to s. 25 of the English Statute quoted below :—

“ 25. Every person who uses or has in his possession or use for trade any weight, measure, scale, balance, steelyard, or weighing machine which is false or unjust, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five pounds, or in the case of a second offence ten pounds, and any contract, bargain, sale or dealing made by the same shall be void, and the weight, measure, scale, balance or steelyard shall be liable to be forfeited.

2757. Procedure and Practice.—Except that the Magistrate may under s. 153 of the Code of Criminal Procedure enter and search for weights and measures, and if they are false, inform the Magistrate, the police have no further power to proceed against the offender. The offence is thus non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class or second class, and may be tried summarily.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) That the accused used an instrument.
- (2) That it was an instrument for weighing.
- (3) That it was false.
- (4) That the accused then knew it to be false.
- (5) That he used it fraudulently.

2759. Charge.—The charge under this, and the next section should run thus :—

“ I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

“ That on or about the—day of—at—you fraudulently used an instrument Exhibit—for weighing (or a weight or measure which was false, or a weight or measure as a different weight or measure from what it is), which you knew to be false (or, in the case of weight and measure, which you knew to be different from what it was), and thereby committed an offence under s. 264 (or s. 265) of the Indian Penal Code, and with my cognizance.

“ And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

2760. Fraudulent Use of False Scale.—Intention to defraud is the essential part of this offence,<sup>2</sup> for, the mere use of false scales is not an offence if there is no intention to cheat, and both parties are aware of it. The false scales presumably favour the user, otherwise if the advantage is the other way there is no offence as there is then no fraud. The section makes it an offence to use false “instrument for weighing,” in other words, scales of a weighing machine. A steelyard is such an instrument. The scales must be false, and they must be used fraudulently. Fraudulent use of correct scales would be cheating, because though there was deception—it was not practised with the aid of false scales.<sup>3</sup> Scales are false if they do not weigh equally from either scale. But in considering whether a given instrument is false regard must be had to the nature of the instrument, and the thing it is intended to weigh. The section does not require that coal or cotton should be weighed in golden scales, so that the difference of a tola or so in five seers could not be held to reduce it to a false instrument.<sup>4</sup> Indeed such a discrepancy would at times be scarcely noticeable. On the other hand where precious metals or stones or things of value have to be weighed, it is but natural to expect greater precision.

2761. In the majority of cases the question whether the use of false scales was or was not fraudulent would be judged by the crude but natural test : “ What profit did he make or was likely to make by his fraud ? But this is neither the sole

(3) Achi, (1882) 1 Weir 223. So the Law Commissioners observe: “It has been suggested that it may be expedient to provide in this chapter for the fraudulent use of a true balance. This it appears to us is an offence which falls within the definition of cheating under which head it will be liable to the same punishment as the offence of using a false balance under this chapter.”—2nd Rep., s. 222, Reprint, p. 404.

(4) Bhikha Mal, (1883) A. W. N. 224

nor an infallible test. It has been said before that intention has to be proved, but intention may be as much a matter of proof, or as it is more often the case, a matter of inference from the fact of the possession and the attendant circumstances, as manifesting the purpose, and such an inference may, of course, be rebutted. But where the incorrectness of the scale is so visible, and, there is no attempt to cover or conceal it, there can be no ground for imputing fraud from that defect alone; that circumstance by itself negatives the intention of fraud, and no charge would lie against the party using such a balance. On the other hand, a false balance artfully contrived to elude detection in the use of it, carries with it a presumption of fraudulent intention, which properly brings it within the scope of this chapter.<sup>1</sup>

2762. A false balance is no less a false balance because it has been made true by the suspension of a removable make-weight from the beam. For the time being such a scale may be true but it is not true by itself and the mischief the section is directed against may be done any moment by the removal of the adjustment. But the case is different, where the make-weight is made an integral part of the machine.<sup>2</sup> As Cockburn, C. J., observed: "Supposing from wear and tear, or any other cause, scales become so affected as to require adjustment, and you effect this by adding something not originally a part of the machine, so as to make it, as it were permanently part of the machine, I am far from saying this addition might not be considered an integral part of the machine, and that the machine, when found on inspection to have been thus permanently adjusted, would not be just. But when you find that the weighing machine, be it scales or any other instrument of weighing, is in itself unjust, and that the error is only rectified by the introduction of some temporary contrivance that can be added or withdrawn at pleasure, the case is very different, and there is the more reason to hold the machine unjust. That, in the present case, the contrivance can readily be made use of for the purpose of fraud, as by merely unhooking this ball or removing the shot the scales become unjust in favour of the seller and against the purchaser."<sup>3</sup> To which Blackburn, J., added: "If scales owing to wear and tear must require adjustment, and if it is necessary that the means of adjustments should be removable, persons using such means, should, in order to be secure against conviction, take care that the scales when the moveable adjustment is removed, should turn against the vendor."<sup>4</sup>

2763. A scale is a false scale, if it is not true whatever may have been the object for the difference. In one case the accused had placed on the scoop of a machine used for weighing tea, a piece of paper for the purpose of convenience and expedition in weighing, because it took longer to weigh the tea if it were placed in the bag in which it was to be sold, before being put into the scoop for weighing. The paper weighed less than the bag in which the tea was sold, but it was held, that inasmuch as the machine when used with the paper indicated a weight in excess of the true weight, it was a false and unjust scale, so that the seller using it became liable to the penalty provided in s. 25 of the Statute.<sup>5</sup>

2764. The term "uses" implies that the person guilty of the offence must have himself used the instrument. But one who employs another to use false balance would be guilty of abetment, if he knows it to be false and intended to defraud thereby, and the actual user may be innocent if he was not privy to it.

265. Whoever fraudulently uses any false weight or false measure of length or capacity, or fraudulently uses any weight or any measure of length or capacity as a different weight or measure from what it is, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

2765. Analogous Law.—The last section deals with the use of a false balance. This section deals with the use of a false weight or measure. The two sections together thus deal with the same offence differently compassed. This section corresponds to s. 26 of the English Statute quoted below :—

“ 26. Where any fraud is wilfully committed in the using of any weight, measure, scale, balance, steelyard or weighing machine, the person committing such fraud, and every person party to the fraud shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five pounds, or in the case of a second offence ten pounds, and the weight, measure, scale, balance or steelyard shall be liable to be forfeited.

Penalty for fraud in use of weight, measure, balance, etc.

2766. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.<sup>1</sup>

2767. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused used a weight or measure.
- (2) That it was false.
- (3) That he used it fraudulently.

2768. Charge.—See under s. 264 (§ 2759).

2769. Fraudulent Use of False Weights and Measures.—A weight is an instrument for measuring the force of gravity as determined for any particular body ; a measure is an instrument by which its extent or capacity is ascertained. No weight need necessarily bear a fixed ratio to a measure, for the one depends upon the force of gravity, and the other on the extent of capacity. There is the greatest diversity conceivable in the use of weights and measures in different countries, and in this country itself, what is a maund in Calcutta is not a maund in Bombay, and in Bombay itself the weight of a maund varies according to the article, and the custom of the trade. The same diversity exists as regards the use of measure. But these incongruities only remotely affect the offence here enacted. It assumes that both parties to a transaction use the same term in the same sense, and both understand and abide by the custom of the trade. If one bargained for a maund of raisins, understanding it to mean 80 pounds avoirdupois, and another quoted for a maund of a local variety weighing only 32 of such pounds, it may be a case of cheating, but there is no use of a false weight or measure.

2770. The offence is confined only to this that if the parties have expressly or impliedly fixed upon an instrument, weight, or measure, with reference to their mutual dealings, one shall not defraud the other by using a different instrument, weight or measure than that agreed upon. If the weight or measure agreed to is itself variable, or uncertain, no one can be blamed for availing himself of it. For instance, a person may purchase cloth at so many hands per rupee. In such a case the “ hand ” may be the hand of a giant but the vendor cannot object to it. If, however, the measure agreed to was by yards, containing 36 inches, the vendor cannot measure out with a measure short of that length. The same remark applies to weights. A pound weighs 40 tolas and a seer 80 tolas. No one purporting to weigh out a seer can use a weight short of 80 tolas. But in such case something must depend upon the nature and value of the article weighed. In weights used for weighing ordinary commodities a small deficiency could scarcely count. For instance, a difference of a tola in a five-seer weight might well be put down to wear and tear.<sup>2</sup> It would scarcely make any appreciable difference in the case of ordinary commodities, though, of course, the more precious the article the more precise would have to be the weight.

2771. In the case of measures, there is a still greater room for discrepancy. And it is in any case wholly fallacious to judge of the correctness of a given measure by reference to a fixed standard of weights, for the weight of a given measure is never invariable, and must vary with the specific gravity and density of the thing measured. Even an article of the same kind may differ in weight. A bushel of pedigree wheat weighs more than a bushel of ordinary wheat. In order to ascertain whether a measure is false or not, the only proper test to apply is that of measure, and the same article must be measured in each case, and proof should be adduced that this had been done. The weight of the grain that a measure is found to hold is no evidence of its capacity as compared with that of another measure, unless the very same grain is used.<sup>1</sup> And, it may be added, even then the result attained is not invariable; and some allowance should be made for the mode and habit of the different measures, and of the same measure on different occasions.

(1) S. 260 (b), Cr. P. C.

(2) Bikka Mal, (1883) A. W. N. 224.

2772. Again, it will be difficult to bring home an offence under this section for using a false measure, unless the measure used was a prescribed measure, or one agreed upon by the parties. If it was neither one nor the other, it is not for either to complain, for what is then the test? If in such a case, there was an assurance as to a certain capacity with reference to a standard measure, and that assurance was false, the accused would be rightly convicted of cheating by his falsehood, but not of using a false measure. So it was held that the accused who sold liquor, measuring it with a glass which was not a prescribed measure, and of which he frequently misrepresented the capacity, could not be convicted under this section though his offence would then certainly fall into the category of cheating.<sup>2</sup>

2773. Of course, it is the primary duty of a person selling by a certain standard of weight or measure to take a reasonable care that the weights and measures he uses are not incorrect.<sup>3</sup> If they vary from the standard materially so as to give the seller considerable advantage, the Court would be justified in attributing the variation to fraud.<sup>4</sup>

2774. But in the Bombay case last cited, the glass was held not to be a measure, because there was no indication thereon that it purported to be one. But if it had been marked to denote a measure, the case would then have been different. Such was the case of the appellant in an English case who was convicted under s. 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878,<sup>5</sup> one of having false measures in his possession for use for trade. He sold milk to a purchaser, and sent it by train in his own churns, which were fitted with gauges to indicate the number of gallons they contained, and the contract of carriage between the appellant, and the Railway Company provided that they should be so fitted. By this contract with the appellant the purchaser was entitled to have the churns regauged when he deemed it necessary. The Magistrate found that in the dealings between the appellant and the purchaser, and between the appellant and the Railway Company, the gauged churns were used as measures, and that as two of the churns purporting to contain 16 gallons contained two pints less, it was held that the gauged churns were measures which the appellant had in his possession for use for trade, within the meaning of the Act, and he was rightly convicted.<sup>6</sup>

266. Whoever is in possession of any instrument for weighing, or of any weight, or of any measure of length or capacity, which he knows to be false, and intending that the same may be fraudulently used, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

2775. Analogous Law.—For its general object this section may be compared to ss. 235, 239, 240, relating to coins, and s. 259 relating to stamps. In each case the offence lies in the fraudulent intention to be put in practice—not in the mischief done, but in the mischief threatened.

2776. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.<sup>1</sup>

- (1) That the accused was in possession of some instrument for weighing, or any weight or measure.
- (2) That the same was false.
- (3) That the accused knew it.
- (4) That he was in possession, intending that the same may be fraudulently used.

2778. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

“That on or about the——day of——at——you were in possession of a certain instrument for weighing (or of a certain weight, or of a certain measure of length or capacity), Exhibit——, to wit——knowing it at the time of your possession to be false, and intending that the same weight might be fraudulently used, and thereby committed an offence under s. 266 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

2779. Possession of False Weight Fraud Expectant.—As it has been remarked in the course of discussions in connection with coins and stamps, so it may be remarked here, that the mere possession of false weights and measures is no offence under the Code, but if such possession is accompanied by the criminal intention,<sup>2</sup> the possession itself becomes criminal and the person in possession is liable to punishment under this section. Four things are, however, required to complete the crime : (i) that the weights and measures must be false ; (ii) that they must be in the possession of the accused ; (iii) that he must know that they are false ; and (iv) that he must have stored them with the intention to defraud. It has already been seen as to what is implied by the expression “false weights and measures.” The meaning of possession has also been the subject of frequent discussion (§§ 239-243). It may, however, be once more repeated that the possession required in this connexion, is such control as can be exclusively traced to the person charged. Added to such possession, there must be knowledge of their falsity. This knowledge must, ordinarily, go with the intention to defraud. But it is possible that there may be knowledge without fraudulent intention.

2780. For instance, a person may put aside false balance, weights and measures as no longer serviceable. He puts them aside knowing them to be false, and because he does not wish to use them. He could not then be punished, for though he had knowledge of their falsity he did not intend to turn it to his advantage. The question whether he had one or the other in such a case would be a knotty one. But the circumstances in which they were found may probably throw a considerable light on the question. If, for instance, the weights and measures were found stowed away with lumber and in a condition showing that they could not have been used since long, the inference arising would be different than if they were found placed on a tradesman’s counter where he usually received his customers. So where the accused, a farmer, had in his barn or out-house a balance or portable weighing machine, and two iron weights which were found to be light, and the Inspector of weights and measures saw no produce about his premises and could not prove that he exposed or kept for sale, or weighed for conveyance or carriage any goods or

(1) S. 260 (b), Cr. P. C.

Harak Chand, 40 A. 84.

(2) Damodhar Dalji, 1 B. H. C. R. 21; produce, it was held that he could not be convicted for keeping light or unjust weights in a shop, store, etc., where goods are sold or weighed for conveyance.<sup>1</sup>

2781. In a prosecution for possessing short weights, the evidence of customers, who had had dealings with the accused, would be admissible, and so will be the evidence of any complaints they may have addressed to him, not as proving the charge but as showing that the attention of the accused having been drawn to the short weights, he could not be unaware of that fact. The evidence of customers receiving short weight would be material for the purpose of showing that the accused defrauded people by their use and that "he intended that the same may be fraudulently used."

2782. It has been held under the corresponding provision<sup>2</sup> of the English Statute that it did not extend to false scales which are the property of the Crown, though they might be false, and, as such, used by a person in his private capacity. The question arose in a case in which the accused, a baker, was also a Post Master, and upon whose counter a false scale belonging to the Post Office was found by the Inspector of weights measures. It was conceded that, if the baker was found selling bread by weighing it on the postal scale, he could be proceeded against under the provisions of 6 and 7 Will., IV, c. 37.<sup>3</sup> The only question argued was whether the Justices had jurisdiction to confiscate false scales if they were the property of the Crown. It was held that they had no such power under s. 25 read with s. 59 of the Statute, which did not extend to the property of the Crown. Mathew, J., said: "The necessary consequence of holding that such scales and weights are within the purview of the Act, would be that the perfectly innocent user of such weights and scales might be punished as criminal, that the whole work of a Post Office might be stopped by seizure of the weights and scales, and that the Justices would have power to order the property of the Crown to be forfeited."<sup>4</sup>

2783. No Offence.—Since the commission of fraud is the gist of the crime, there can be no fraud where a short weight or measure is customary. So where the village shopkeeper used a yard measure only 35½ inches long and it was found that every one in the village knew it to be the prevailing measure, the accused could not be convicted of this offence, though his measure was not a standard measure.<sup>5</sup>

267. Whoever makes, sells, or disposes of any instrument for weighing, or any weight, or any measure of length or capacity which he knows to be false, in order that the same may be used as true, or knowing that the same is likely to be used as true, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Making or selling false weight or measure.

2784. Analogous Law.—This section corresponds with s. 27 of the English Statute<sup>6</sup> which run as follows:—

"27. A person shall not wilfully or knowingly make or sell or cause to be made or, sold, any false or unjust weight, measure, scale, balance, steel-yard or weighing machine, and every person who acts in contravention of this section shall be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds, or in the case of a second offence, fifty pounds."

Penalty on sale of false weight, measure, balance, etc.

2785. Similar offences relating to coin and stamps are described in ss. 239-241 and 258, from which last this section makes a departure in that it does not punish one who merely "offers for sale" a false scale, weight or measure.

2786. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

2787. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused either made, sold or disposed of an instrument, or any weight or measure;
- (2) That it was false;
- (3) That he then knew it to be false;
- (4) That he so made, sold or disposed of it in order that it might be used as true or that he knew that it was likely to be used as true.

2788. Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

“I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

“That on or about the——day of——at——you made (or sold or disposed of) Exhibit ——which was an instrument for weight (or a weight or measure of length or capacity) knowing at the time of making (or selling or disposing of) it, to be false, in order that the said, instrument might be used as true (or knowing that the said instrument was likely to be used as true and thereby committed an offence) punishable under s. 267 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

“And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.”

2789. Traffic in False Weights.—This section penalizes the making, selling or disposing of a false scale, weight or measure. It does not prohibit its import and export, but merely its manufacture. A true scale, weight or measure may be made false by tampering with it. It is not necessary under this section that the maker should make a false weight a new. The disposal of an instrument may or may not be for a valuable consideration. The offence lies in putting in circulation false weights, with the intention that they should be used as true. In other words, it is the intention accompanying the act that makes the act criminal.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING THE PUBLIC HEALTH, SAFETY, CONVENIENCE, DECENCY AND MORALS.

2790. Topical Introduction.—The title of this chapter is one definition of a public nuisance. It is an offence affecting the public health, safety, convenience, decency or morals. According to Blackstone, “common nuisances are a species of offence against the public order and economical regimen of the state; being either the doing of a thing to the annoyance of all the King’s subjects, or neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires.”<sup>1</sup> A nuisance,<sup>2</sup> nocumentum, or annoyance, signifies anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience or damage. Nuisances are of two kinds, public or common nuisances, which affect the public, and are an annoyance to all the King’s subjects, and are, therefore, treated as public wrongs; and private nuisances which are done to the hurt, or annoyance of the lands, tenements or hereditaments of another.<sup>3</sup> Affecting as they do only a member of the public and not the public generally, they are treated as private wrongs for which the person injured has redress by a civil action, but which are not indictable. Where, however, besides being injurious to a private person they are also detrimental to the public, they are then treated as public nuisances, and are then punishable by a public prosecution. The old books contain many curious instances of such nuisances. Besides those which are even now classed as public nuisances, such as disorderly inns or ale-houses, bawdy houses, gaming houses, stage plays, unlicensed booths and stages for ropedancers, mountebanks and the like,<sup>4</sup> and those created by Statute, such as lotteries,<sup>5</sup> the making and selling of fireworks and squibs or throwing them about in any street,<sup>6</sup> the keeping of an inordinate quantity of gunpowder in one place or vehicle,<sup>7</sup> there are those which the early writers classed as public nuisances, but reference to which can scarcely be made without provoking a smile.

2791. Such, for instance, was the Statute against the erection of single cottages on the waste, which, being harbours for thieves and other idle and dissolute persons, were treated as nuisances.<sup>8</sup> So were eavesdroppers, or such as would listen under walls or windows, or the eaves of a house, or hearken after discourse, and thereupon frame slanderous and mischievous tales, all these were indictable as common nuisances at the sessions and were punishable by fine and finding securities for their good behaviour.<sup>9</sup> So was also a common scold (communis rixatrix) who was held to be public nuisance to her neighbourhood, for which she was liable to be indicted and, if convicted, placed in a certain engine of correction, called the trebucket, castigatory, or cucking stool, which meant the scolding stool, afterwards corrupted into ducking stool, on account of the ducking in water which concluded her punishment. Some will still regret that the modern puritan spirit has eliminated eavesdroppers and scolds from the table of public nuisances.

2792. There is no statutory definition of a public nuisance in English Law. One such definition was attempted by the authors of the Digest of Criminal Law,<sup>10</sup> from which the Indian Law Commissioners have largely borrowed for the purpose of the Code.<sup>11</sup> The definition of “nuisance” in the Public Health Act, 1875 (ss. 91 & 112) is also instructive.<sup>12</sup>

2793. This Statute deals also with other cases of nuisances, referred to under appropriate sections.

2794. This Chapter deals with nuisances considered as offences. Chapters X (ss. 133-143) and XI (s. 144) of the Procedure Code prescribe the procedure relating to the abetment of nuisances, s. 144 dealing with a nuisance in case of urgency. The powers conferred by those sections on certain Magistrates, are confined to the nuisances described in section 133, which, however, is another working definition of the term. Proceedings under Chapters X and XI of the Procedure Code are optional, and the fact that no proceedings were taken under the Procedure Code cannot be pleaded as a bar to a prosecution under this section.<sup>1</sup> And since a public nuisance is both indictable as well as actionable, there is nothing to prevent a person individually affected by the nuisance, from enforcing his civil remedy without having recourse to a prosecution.<sup>2</sup> So Lord Ellenborough said in a case: "I did not expect that it would have been disputed at this day that though a nuisance may be public, yet that there may be a special grievance, arising out of the common cause of injury, which presses more upon particular individuals than upon others not so immediately within the influence of it. In the case of stopping a common highway which may affect all the subjects, yet if a particular person sustain a special injury from it, he has an action."<sup>3</sup> So Abbot, C. J., said, "I take it to be a general rule, that a party who sustains a special and particular injury by an act which is unlawful, on the ground of public injury, may maintain an action for his own special injury."<sup>4</sup> But without special injury there can be no civil action for damages<sup>5</sup> though it may expose the nuisance-feasor to a prosecution for his act. And inconvenience suffered in common with the rest of the community is not such a special injury.

2795. All Nuisances Possess One Common Feature—They cause or are conducive to the injury, destruction, danger or annoyance of a person or persons collectively. This chapter deals only with such nuisances as affect the public and not only some of its members. The definition of the term given in section 268 makes this sufficiently clear. The rest of the chapter then describes and provides punishments for specific nuisances—those not so covered being punishable under the residuary provisions of section 290. There are eleven principal cases of nuisances specifically dealt with. They are:—

- (1) Spread of infection (ss. 269-271).
- (2) Fouling water (s. 277).
- (3) Making atmosphere noxious to health (s. 278).
- (4) Adulteration of food, drink and drugs (ss. 272-276).
- (5) Rash driving (s. 279).
- (6) Rash navigation (ss. 280, 282).
- (7) Endangering public ways (ss. 281, 288).
- (8) Negligent handling of poisons, combustible and explosives (ss. 284-286).
- (9) Negligence with respect to—
  - (a) machinery (s. 287).
  - (b) buildings (s. 288).
  - (c) animals (s. 289).
- (10) Spread of obscenity (ss. 292-294).
- (11) Public gambling (s. 294-A).

2796. Section 290 refers to cases not otherwise provided for. These sections then include all that is regarded as nuisances in English Law. Besides them, there are other cases of minor nuisances against which provision has been made in the various special and local laws dealing with the health and sanitation of towns and urban areas.<sup>6</sup>

2797. Private Defence Against Public Nuisance.—It was, at one time the common view, that any one could pull down or destroy a public nuisance, and so, it was said that any one whose property was prejudiced by a private nuisance could justify the entering into another's land and pulling down and destroying such nuisance.<sup>7</sup> But as regards the right to remove a public nuisance, it has now been held that, if there is a nuisance in a highway, a private individual cannot, of his own authority, abate it, unless it does him special injury, and he can only interfere with it so far as is necessary to exercise his right of passing along the highway, and he cannot justify any damage to the property of another who has improperly placed the nuisance in the highway, if by avoiding it, he might have passed on with reasonable convenience.<sup>8</sup>

2798. The explanation definitely overrules the English common law rule and the cases in which it was adopted till 1865 when the House of Lords settled the rule in accordance with the section.<sup>1</sup>

268. A person is guilty of a public nuisance who does any act or is guilty of an illegal omission which causes any common injury, danger, or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity, or which must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger, or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.

Public nuisance.

A common nuisance is not excused on the ground that it causes some convenience or advantage.

[Person—s. 11. Public—s. 12. Act—s. 33. Illegal—s. 43. Injury—s. 144.]

2799. Analogous Law.—The definition of “public nuisance” here given applies to all Acts of the Governor-General in Council and Regulations under 33 Vict., c. 3, s. 1 made after 14th January 1887.<sup>2</sup>

2800. Principle.—This chapter dealing with the subject of public nuisances is intended to protect three classes of persons: (a) the public, (b) the neighbours as distinct from the public, and (c) persons possessing a public right. In each case, the nuisance-feasor must be guilty of an act or an illegal omission. But its resultant effect is not, in each case, the same. For instance, where the nuisance affects the public or the neighbours, it must cause a common injury, where it affects the enjoyment of a public right, it must necessarily cause an injury. In such a case, the injury may be likely and it need not be suffered in common. This distinction is important, for, while in the one case there must be evidence of an actual injury, it will suffice, in the other case, if the injury is inevitable, though it was not actually caused. Again, while, in the former case, there must be evidence that the nuisance affected a number of persons generally, in the latter case, this is not necessary. If any individual suffered or was likely to suffer, an infringement of a public right, it may amount to a nuisance though the public at large may be unaffected by it.

2801. The question what amounts to “injury, danger or annoyance” in the one case and an obstruction to use of a public right in the other depends upon public convenience. As such, criminality in such cases depends not upon intention and knowledge but upon injurious effect produced in the manner stated.<sup>3</sup> This is true whether the nuisance be public or private, or whether it is indictable or merely actionable.<sup>4</sup>

2802. Analysis of Public Nuisance.—This section follows the general scheme adopted in the Code of not defining a term in the abstract, but defining it in relation to the doer. As such, it defines the doer of a public nuisance to be one (i) who does any act or is guilty of an illegal omission, which (ii) causes (a) any common injury or (b) danger or (c) annoyance (iii) to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity or (iv) which must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right. The section then adds that (v) it is no answer to a public nuisance that it causes some convenience or advantage.

2803. In order to constitute a public nuisance, there must be, then, in the first place, an act or an illegal omission. An act, as such, does not include an omission—much less an illegal omission.<sup>5</sup> Any act may amount to a public nuisance. It is not necessary that it should be, in itself, an illegal act. But as soon as it becomes a nuisance, the act itself becomes illegal, not because it is per se illegal, but because it has an injurious effect upon and is intolerable to the public. Public nuisance is, then, a recognition of the maxims of civil law—sic utari tuo ut alienum non lædas<sup>1</sup> sic utari tuo ut rem publicam non lædas.<sup>2</sup> It is, then, no defence to a charge of public nuisance that the act done was in assertion of one's right in property, or that it was done on one's own property, or indeed, that it had been done from time immemorial. This suggests the question whether the right to continue a nuisance can be acquired by prescription. The question depends upon the nuisance.<sup>3</sup> At one time, it was held that a right to a nuisance might be acquired by prescription, because it was said that it was the complainant who went to the nuisance and not the nuisance to him. This is no longer the law. It is now settled that neither prescription nor custom would legalize a public nuisance.<sup>4</sup> Even where the nuisance is private, the question is one of degree and inconvenience caused to the party aggrieved. A nuisance, imperilling the health of a neighbour or destroying his amenities, would be as much subject of redress as a public nuisance, though this chapter deals only with such nuisances which are injurious to health and life.

2804. But while prescription is no answer to a charge of public nuisance

under this chapter, still it may give to the objection of the person possessing and enjoying a right the character of a bona fide dispute as to title, which might have the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the Magistrate under sections 133 and 137 of the Procedure Code, and making the question a proper one for the Civil Courts.<sup>5</sup> If an act is a nuisance, the presence of other nuisances will not justify it, nor indeed, is it any defence that the accused's act only contributed to the public nuisance. Such was the case of a varnish maker who being indicted for causing a public nuisance, pleaded that the offensive smells proceeded as much from his factory as from the neighbouring slaughter-houses, brewery, a gas factory, a melter of kitchen-stuff and a blood-boiler, and that although the accumulation of all the smells was offensive, yet the accused's alone was not sufficient, whereupon Abbot, C.J., said: "It is not necessary that a public nuisance should be injurious to health; if there be smells offensive to the senses, that is enough, as the neighbourhood has a right to fresh and pure air. It has been proved that a number of other offensive trades are carried on near this place, knackers, melters of kitchen-stuff, etc., but the presence of other nuisances will not justify any one of them: or the more nuisances there were the more fixed they would be; however, one is not the less subject to prosecution because others are culpable. The only question, therefore, is this: is the business, as carried on by the defendant, productive of smells offensive to persons passing along the public highway."<sup>6</sup>

2805. The question whether the act of the accused did or did not amount to public nuisance depends upon whether it has the effects which are characteristic of a nuisance. They must be, however, due to the act or illegal omission of the accused. Every omission resulting in a nuisance is not indictable, whatever other remedial rights the Courts may otherwise possess. Thus in England, there is a Statute which binds the owner to fence wells in his premises within twenty-five yards of, and open to, the highway, but there is not the same statutory obligation in India. Therefore, the accused who neglected to fence his well at a distance of only eight yards from the highway, may endanger the public, but he could not be convicted of this offence because his omission is not illegal.<sup>1</sup> That term is defined in section 43 of the Code to be applicable to everything which is an offence, or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes a ground for a civil action. The test in such cases then is: was the omission, of itself, an offence, or was it prohibited or did it furnish a ground for a civil action.

2806. Now in the case of an unfenced well, a person straying from the road might fall into it, but would this furnish him a ground for a civil action? It would not, because he could not fall without contributory negligence; for the person so falling into the well would be bound to keep to the public road, and his fall would be the consequence of the neglect of his duty. Of course, where there is no legal duty, an omission to do what a person had been in the habit of doing, believing it to be his duty, would not make the omission illegal. So Keating, J., observed in a case:<sup>2</sup> "To throw upon the owner the objection of fencing a pit in his land adjoining a road, it ought to be shown that the pit is near as to be dangerous to person using the road in the line of the road." To which Williams, J., added: "No right is averred but merely that the owners allowed persons for diversion or business to go across the waste without complaint. But a person using the waste has no right to complain of any excavations he may find there; he must accept the permission with its concomitant conditions, which may be its perils." "The proper and true test of legal obligation is," Wightman, J., observed, "whether the excavation be substantially adjoining the way, and it would be very dangerous if it were otherwise—if in every case it was to be left as a fact to the jury, whether the excavations were sufficiently near to the highway to be dangerous."<sup>3</sup> So where the defendant was possessed of a canal and the land between it and a sluice, and an ancient public footpath passed through the land close to the sluice, it was held that the path was not so near the canal as to render the defendant liable for any accident which may befall those who made use of the path.<sup>4</sup>

2807. So the lambardar of a village, where a fair was annually held, used to make arrangements every year at the time of the fair for the sanitation of the place. In one year he failed to do so, and he was convicted of this offence because of his failure to make the usual arrangements, and because the public roadway had been for several hundred yards covered with faetid matter; it was held that the conviction could not be sustained as there was no legal obligation on the accused to attend to the sanitation.<sup>5</sup>

2808. Again, though there may be an act or illegal omission causing an injury, it does not necessarily amount to a public nuisance unless the injury so caused is common to the public. For example, the injury resulting from the straying of one's cattle into other people's garden is in consequence of an illegal omission, because every individual so injured may maintain a civil suit for damages against the owner of the strayed cattle, but it is, nevertheless, not a public nuisance, because the injury so done is neither common to the public, nor was it caused to persons who had occasion to use any public right.<sup>6</sup> But such would be the case, if the cattle had been let loose at night on a road.<sup>7</sup> So a person, trotting in a marketplace rams trained to fight, was convicted of this offence, because his act was calculated to cause injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons using a public right, namely, the market.<sup>8</sup> So while there is nothing against possessing a furious mastiff, its going on the streets unmuzzled is, from the ferocity of his nature, and the likelihood of his being a cause of terror to the public, a public nuisance for which the owner is indictable.<sup>1</sup> And so it is said that the setting up of a sty for swine in inconvenient parts of a town where they cannot but incommode the neighbourhood, is a common nuisance.<sup>2</sup>

2809. In this connection it may be inquired, what the section means by the term "public." As defined elsewhere,<sup>3</sup> the word "public" is said to include any class of the public, or any community. But that class must obviously be non-sectarian, and numerically sufficient to be designated "the public." The question, whether a number of persons injuriously affected by a nuisance are sufficiently large enough to be designated the public, is a question of fact which the Magistrate will have to decide having regard to the nature of the nuisance and its effect upon the public generally or upon any section of the public complaining of its existence.

2810. In one case the Mahomedans had set up an image during the Mohurram festival on a piece of waste land forming part of the village site and in the proximity of a Hindu temple. It was proved that the setting up of the image was likely to cause serious annoyance to the Hindus. And the question then raised was, did it suffice to constitute a public nuisance, but Turner, C. J., referring to the section, remarked: "It is obvious from the language of the Act that it was not intended to apply to acts and omissions calculated to offend the sentiments of a class. In this country, it must often happen that acts are done by the followers of a creed which must be offensive to the sentiments of those who follow other creeds. The erection of a place of worship in a particular spot is likely to offend the sentiments of the adherents of other creeds residing in the neighbourhood; but the Penal Code does not regard such an act as a public nuisance. The scope of the provision we are considering is to protect the public or people in general, as distinguished from the members of a sect, from injury, danger or annoyance in the neighbourhood of places where they dwell or occupy property, or when they have occasion to use a public right."<sup>4</sup> In this view the action of the Mohammedans could not be held to amount to a public nuisance, and as such, punishable under section 290.

2811. This view was adopted in Bombay in a case in which the Jains had complained against the accused's having cut up, in their view, in the verandah of his house, meat that was to be cooked for a dinner. The meat was fresh and no noxious smell emitted therefrom. Its exposure was, however, revolting to the feelings of the Jains who resided in the neighbourhood, but that alone was held to be insufficient to constitute a nuisance.<sup>5</sup> But this case was so decided because the very sight of meat is offensive to the Jains whose susceptibilities could not be respected to the extent of prohibiting the exposure of mutton. But suppose, if in such a case, the slaughter had been made in public on purpose so that the groans and blood of the poor slaughtered beast, were heard and seen by the passers-by, would it not cause annoyance to the public at large, whether Hindu, Mahomedan or Christian? In such a case, the act of the accused would clearly amount to a public nuisance.<sup>6</sup> The question in such cases then depends not so much upon what was done, but how it was done and what was its effect upon the general public. For instance, every Mahomedan has the right to slaughter kine, if he is so minded. If he cut them up before people were about, the fact that one or two members of a certain community witnessed it and felt thereby annoyed, would not convert a legitimate act into a public nuisance.<sup>7</sup> On the other hand, if the killing was done in a manner revolting to humanity, it could not be avoided being so punished. So the mere sale of meat or fish near or on a public road, cannot be deemed a nuisance<sup>1</sup> though the fact that such exposure is offensive to the religious susceptibilities may be a matter for executive action.

2812. The same view of the rights of the public underlay another case in which the accused who were Hindu Sonars belonging to a sect called Shumsees had complained against the other Hindu residents who had excluded them from the wells and all social intercourse.<sup>2</sup>

2813. There can be no common injury to the public where there is no public or persons sufficiently large at hand to feel the annoyance. A certain act might be immoral and annoying to the public, if it were known to them, but such a possibility does not enter in the case of a public nuisance. A traveller was putting up in a dak bungalow and on his invitation a prostitute paid him a visit ; she had been warned against visiting that place and was, therefore, prosecuted for a public nuisance, but it was held that both the elements of common injury and injury to the public were wanting, and that the woman could not, therefore, be convicted.<sup>3</sup> So bare solicitation of chastity even in a public place, is not a public nuisance, as it proves or suggests no fact relating to any common injury, danger or annoyance which is an essential element of the offence.<sup>4</sup>

2814. Either injury, danger or annoyance must be the necessary consequence of the act of the nuisance-feasor. The danger, here spoken of, may arise to the public health or safety in a variety of ways. Some of the more important cases of such danger have been specifically provided for in the Act. Others will be punishable under the more general provisions of section 290. A person fouling the water of a stream by putting into it bundles of stalks of tur plants, would be so punishable.<sup>5</sup> The same fate will befall one who makes the atmosphere noxious to health, by depositing dust and sweepings on the road in front of his house,<sup>6</sup> or keeping on his premises vegetable matter exuding offensive odour to persons using the public street.<sup>7</sup> Of course, this does not apply to the throwing of rubbish into one's own garden, so long as the nuisance does not affect the public or the passers-by.<sup>8</sup>

2815. The negligent blasting of stone in a quarry so as to endanger the safety of persons living in the vicinity, is a public indictable nuisance.<sup>9</sup> So the erection of buildings and making fires which sent forth noisome, offensive and stinking smokes, and making great quantities of noisome, offensive and stinking liquors near to the common highway and near to the dwelling houses of several of the inhabitants, whereby the air was impregnated with noisome and offensive stinks and smells, was held to be a common nuisance.<sup>10</sup> So the steeping of stinking skins in water, laying it to be committed near the highway and also near several dwelling houses, was held to be an indictable nuisance.<sup>11</sup> So allowing a building near a highway to be ruinous and dangerous to the public, is a common nuisance as it is a danger to the passers-by.<sup>12</sup> All these cases proceed upon the assumption that every one has the right to pure and fresh air.<sup>13</sup>

2816. But, in civil law, there is a distinction between an action for a nuisance in respect of an act producing a material injury to property, and one brought in respect of an act producing only personal discomfort. As to the latter, a person must, in the interests of the public generally, submit to the discomfort of the circumstances of the place, and the trade carried on around him ; as to the former, the same rule would not apply. "With regard to the latter, namely, the personal inconvenience and interference with one's enjoyment, one's guilt, one's personal freedom—anything that discomposes or injuriously affects the senses of the nerves, whether that may or may not be denominated a nuisance—must undoubtedly depend greatly on the circumstances of the place, where the thing complained of actually occurs. If a man lives in a town, it is necessary that he should subject himself to the consequences of those operations of trade and commerce, and also for the enjoyment of the property, and for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town or the public at large. If a man lives in a street where there are numerous shops, and a shop is opened next door to him, which is carried on in a fair and reasonable way, he has no ground for complaint, because to himself individually, there may arise much discomfort from the trade carried on in that shop. But when an occupation is carried on by one person in the neighbourhood of another and the result of that trade or occupation or business is a material injury to the property, then there unquestionably arises a very different consideration. I think that, in a case of that description, the submission which is required from persons living in society to that amount of discomfort which may be necessary for the legitimate and free exercise of the trade of their neighbours, would not apply to circumstances, the immediate result of which is sensible injury to the value of the property."<sup>1</sup> The question whether the danger from any trade or occupation is sufficient to endanger the neighbourhood so as to constitute a public nuisance, depends, then, upon whether the injury is to the property or person; in the former case, there must be evidence of visible diminution in the value of property for which purpose, locality and all other circumstances must be taken into consideration, and in countries where great works have been and were carried on before, parties must not stand on extreme rights.<sup>2</sup>

2817. This raises the more difficult question of annoyance to the public.

(3) Annoyance. But it is clear that, here again, the annoyance caused must be to the public generally, and not only to any section or class of persons not sufficiently large or general to be included in that term. But while the annoyance must be general, it does not mean that a multitude of men must complain. The fact that one person complains of a nuisance is sufficient, provided the nuisance is one which affects him and others.<sup>3</sup> But a nuisance of which only a few complain and the many do not, would not be indictable as a public nuisance (§ 105).

2818. So where certain residents of the chambers in Clifford's Inn complained against a tinman of noise made in carrying on his trade, and it appeared that the noise only affected the inhabitants of three members of the chambers, and that by shutting the windows the noise was in a great measure prevented, Lord Ellenborough held that the indictment could not be sustained, as the nuisance was a private nuisance.<sup>4</sup> But where a person was charged with keeping certain enclosed lands in the proximity of a certain highway and buildings, which attracted a concourse of idle and disorderly people for rifle and pigeon shooting who crowded the street, discharging fire-arms and making a great noise as they ran about in pursuit of the escaped pigeons, it was held that the defendant was liable to be indicted for a nuisance, for if a person collects together a crowd of people to the annoyance of his neighbours, that is a nuisance for which he is answerable; and although it may not be his object to create a nuisance, yet, if it be the probable consequence of his act, he is answerable as if it were his actual object: if the experience of mankind must lead any one to expect the result, he will be answerable for it.<sup>5</sup> So an indictment against a defendant that he kept a common ill-governed and disorderly house, and in the said house for his lucre, etc., certain persons of ill-fame, etc., used to frequent and come together who caused and procured the said persons in the said house to remain cock-fighting, boxing, playing at cudgels and misbehaving themselves, was held to be good.<sup>1</sup> Similarly, the Court held it to be a public nuisance where the accused were found to have caused annoyance and obstruction to the public by gambling on a thoroughfare.<sup>2</sup>

2819. Disorderly Houses.—But whether the house of a prostitute, which is visited by a number of men both day and night, can be designated a brothel or bawdy house, is one upon which the cases are not unanimous.<sup>3</sup> So it was observed in a case in which the Magistrate had ordered the removal of a prostitute from her house which she had erected in a respectable neighbourhood, but the High Court observed: "I do not understand the section to contemplate a case like this. It may be extremely unpleasant for the respectable inhabitants of the quarter to have a woman of Nundo Coomaree's class installed close by and in her own house too, but unless it can be shown that her dwelling there causes actual and positive discomfort to her neighbours, she cannot be removed. If she made her house the resort of bad characters, or filled it with noisy revellers at nights, or entertained her admirers with music or disreputable nautches, her continuing in the place where she is, might very well be a discomfort amounting to a positive nuisance to the neighbourhood, such as would warrant a Magistrate's interference under s. 521 (now s. 133) of the Code of Criminal Procedure; but nothing of this sort is alleged; in fact, it is quite clear that the only objection to the woman's living in her house is the character of her profession, which is considered by the respectable inhabitants of the mohulla, to be an insult to their virtue."<sup>4</sup>

2820. The same view was taken in an English case<sup>5</sup> but, in another case, the appellant was employed by the owner as the porter in charge of a block of eighteen flats, among the tenants of which were twelve women who were in the habit of bringing men to them for the purpose of prostitution. He knew the purpose for which the women used the premises and was convicted under s. 13 (3) of Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, of being wilfully a party to the continued use of the premises or part thereof as a brothel. It was held that the conviction was right, as it was open to that Magistrate upon the evidence to find that it was not a case of each single flat being used for prostitution by one woman who was the tenant of it, but of the building as a whole being converted into a brothel.<sup>6</sup>

2821. To the same class belong disorderly houses maintained for gambling, and the keeping up of lottery or betting houses. They attract a number of disorderly persons and thus cause annoyance to the neighbours. In England, a common gaming house, is, as such, a nuisance,<sup>7</sup> but there is nothing corresponding to it in this country. The question may, then, arise whether the keeper of a common gaming house can be indicted for a public nuisance. It has been held that in the absence of any statutory provision, the mere keeping of such a house cannot expose the keeper to the penalty of this section, unless there is evidence of any actual annoyance to the public.<sup>8</sup> And this view has commended itself to the other Courts.<sup>9</sup>

2822. Legalized Nuisances.—Such cases may be called nuisances of necessity. They are often called legalized nuisances, being indeed, instances of those compromises belonging to social life upon which the peace and comfort of that life mainly depend, and in which some apparent natural right is invaded or some enjoyment abridged to provide for the more general convenience or necessities of the whole community.<sup>1</sup> So it often happens that certain acts are done under the authority of the Legislature. In such cases, the Legislature not only legalizes the act but also the nuisance which is necessarily incident to it. Such a nuisance may involve even an invasion on rights which would not be otherwise tolerated. But, even in such cases, there is a distinction between acts which are imperative and those which are merely authorized. So where an act of Parliament authorized the construction of a small-pox hospital, but did not enjoin the purchase of lands and the erection of buildings for the purpose and the defendants erected a hospital near the plaintiff's properties, it was held that they had no such right, and that the Act merely empowering the construction of hospitals did not, and could not legalize the perpetration of a nuisance, unless they could justify it on the ground of necessity.

2823. So Lord Watson said: "If the order of the Legislature can be implemented without nuisance, they (defendants) cannot, in my opinion, plead the protection of the Statute; on the other hand, it is sufficient for their protection that what is contemplated by the Statute cannot be done without nuisance, unless they are also able to show that the Legislature has directed it to be done. Where the terms of the Statute are not imperative, but permissive (when it is left to the discretion of the persons empowered to determine whether the general powers committed to them shall be put into execution or not), I think the fair inference is that the Legislature intended that the discretion be exercised in strict conformity with private rights, and did not intend to confer license to commit nuisance in any place which might be selected for the purpose."<sup>2</sup> But, of course, even such a nuisance may be tolerated in the case of necessity. As Lord Blackburn put it: "when the disease is infectious, there is a legal obligation on the sick person and on those who have the custody of him, not to do anything that can be avoided which shall tend to spread the infection; and if either do so, as by bringing the infected person into a thoroughfare, it is an indictable offence, though it will be a defence to an indictment if it can be shown that there was a sufficient cause to execute what is prima facie wrong."<sup>3</sup>

2824. The fact that the accused was entitled to do an act, does not, then, necessarily imply that the doing would be justified if it created a nuisance. The defendant, a canal company, were indicted for collecting and continuing, in their canal, polluted matter or water, so as to be a public nuisance. They defended themselves on the ground that the water was polluted higher up by another and that all that they did was to receive as it came to them. The nuisance was also justified on the ground of delay, it being contended that the water had been received in that state for twenty years. Both the contentions were, however, overruled, Wood, V. C., observing: "The only authority the Act of Parliament gives them is to draw water; it does not say that they are to draw foul or filthy water, or that they are to draw all these nuisances into the canal."<sup>4</sup> Then the learned judge dealt with the contention raised, that the stoppage of the defendant's nuisance would lead to a worse nuisance, in that the whole of the filth would be thrown back, to which the judge replied, "That is an argument which might be presented in every case where there are four or five evils at once assailing those who complain. It would be impossible for the Court to wait till bills were filed in three or four other cases and be governed, to some extent, by the decision in those other cases."<sup>5</sup> As to delay it was observed that the public always take time to wait for a considerable time before it can be ascertained that a case has arisen for them to put themselves in motion. They wait for a time to see if the evil will diminish, and in no case, any defence, founded on the defendant's faith in being allowed to continue the nuisance, can be supported.<sup>1</sup>

2825. In the case of Railway Companies, where the Legislature authorizes them to acquire and build a railway station, godowns and cattlepens, it also impliedly legalizes any nuisance that may be thereby necessarily occasioned.<sup>2</sup> But they must do all they can to minimize the annoyance to the public.<sup>3</sup> This is the rule, and whether a railway company, or for that matter, any other company, can be indicted for a public nuisance depends upon two questions: (a) Could the nuisance have been avoided? and (b) did the defendant take reasonable care to avoid it? The one without the other is not sufficient. In one case, the defendants, who were a tramway company were empowered by their act to lay down and construct two lines of tramways according to deposited plans, together with the works and conveniences connected therewith. The Act gave no compulsory powers for taking lands and made no special mention of building stables. The defendants constructed large stables near the plaintiff's house, from which exuded smells, of which the plaintiff complained. The defence was that the company had taken all reasonable care to prevent the nuisance, but it was held to be no defence.<sup>4</sup> Of course, if, in this case, the Legislature had authorized the construction of the stables at the place, then it would have been a sufficient answer, for the nuisance would, then, be regarded as legalized in the interest of the public,<sup>5</sup> and it would be one, the propriety of which could not even be examined by the Municipal Courts.<sup>6</sup> Of course, in such a case, license to commit nuisance must be either expressly conferred, or, at least, necessarily implied. It cannot be assumed that it was legal, because the act authorized could only be done by committing the nuisance. In such cases, it is no answer to say that the defendant had taken reasonable care not to create a nuisance. For, in such cases, the only legal right is the right which is subject to the general law of the country—that no one shall commit a nuisance.<sup>7</sup>

2826. Of course, there may be cases of only temporary nuisances regarding which a different view is possible. As William, J., remarked, in considering what constitutes a nuisance; "law takes into consideration both the object as well as the duration of that which is to constitute the nuisance."<sup>8</sup> The injury or annoyance must not be "fleeting or evanescent"<sup>9</sup> But as Fry, L. J., pointed out that "nothing can be deemed to be fleeting or evanescent which results in substantial damage and that the question, therefore, is to be answered, not by time, but by the effects upon the plaintiff."<sup>10</sup> But this was the case of a private nuisance in which special damages were alleged and proved. The case of a public nuisance stands upon a different footing. For in that case, if the annoyance occasioned was temporary and for a lawful object, it could not be objected to. As William, J., said: "It frequently happens that the owners or occupiers of land cause, in the execution of lawful works in the ordinary user of land, a considerable amount of temporary annoyance to their neighbours; but they are not necessarily on that account held to be guilty of causing an unlawful nuisance. The business of life could not be carried on if it were so. For instance, a man who pulls down his house for the purpose of building a new one no doubt causes considerable inconvenience to his next-door neighbours during the process of demolition; but he is not responsible as for a nuisance if he uses all reasonable skill and care to avoid annoyance to his neighbours by the works of demolition."<sup>11</sup>

2827. Of course, whether anything is a nuisance or not is a question to be determined, not merely by an abstract consideration of the thing itself, but in reference to its circumstances. What would be a nuisance in Belgrave Square would not necessarily be so in Bermondsey, and where a locality is devoted to a particular trade or manufacture carried on by the traders or manufacturers in a particular and established manner not constituting a public nuisance, judges and juries would be justified in finding and may be trusted to find, that the trade or manufacture so carried on in that locality is not a private or actionable wrong.<sup>1</sup>

2828. Again, the annoyance complained of must not only be real but reasonable. A number of persons may object to the erection of a hospital for the treatment of cases of small-pox. It must, then, be shown not only that small-pox was popularly dreaded but that it was scientifically dreadful as that it was disseminated by aerial conviction. That small-pox can be so conveyed has not received the unequivocal sanction of medical science, so that a hospital for the treatment of that disease is not necessarily a serious source of danger to persons resident, working or passing within fifty feet of it.<sup>2</sup>

2829. Injury to Exercise of Public Right.—It is also a public nuisance where an act necessarily causes injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right. In such a case, the injury may not be caused in common, but it must have been caused necessarily. In that case, three things are essential: (i) there must be a public right, and (ii) in exercise of that right the act must cause injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance, and (iii) it must be caused necessarily. For instance, the right of way on land or on a navigable river or sea is a public right, the infringement of which may constitute a nuisance, if it necessarily causes obstruction, whatever may have been the object or intention of the accused. So persons placing a bamboo stockade across a tidal navigable river for the purpose of fishing, although leaving in such stockade a narrow opening for the passage of boats, which was closed except when required, were held to have brought themselves within the provisions of this section, though the accused kept the passage lighter and watched by men to prevent accidents.<sup>3</sup>

2830. This question was considered in another case in which it was said that the section was not intended to penalize an obstruction however slight.<sup>4</sup> In that case, the prisoner had been charged with having erected a jag in a tidal navigable river constructed of trees and dams which was 45 cubits long by 20 feet broad, erected on the silted side of the river, where it was about 300 cubits broad and it did not obstruct the ordinary navigation of the river. It was held that as there was no obstruction to the ordinary navigation of the river the accused could not be convicted under s. 290.<sup>5</sup> All that this case is intended to lay down is that the nuisance to be indictable must be such as to amount to an injury or obstruction to the ordinary exercise of a public right.

2831. But this is not the view taken in Madras where it was said: "The public is entitled to the use of the full width of the public street, however wide it may be. Whoever appropriates any part of the street by building over it infringes the right of the public quoad the part built over. The act must necessarily cause obstruction to persons who may have occasion to use their public right over the part encroached upon."<sup>6</sup> This view accords with the view of Couch, C. J., who said "certainly, persons are not at liberty to place a quantity of earth upon any part of the public road, whether it is a part which is actually used for the passage of vehicles or not. In either case, a person has no right to interfere with the use of it according to the public rights."<sup>1</sup> So the accused who had thrown earth dug from a tank on a drain causing its obstruction was held to have committed an offence under s. 290, though not one under s. 447, for which he had been erroneously convicted by the Magistrate. The High Court, however, declined to interfere holding that the error had not prejudiced the accused.<sup>2</sup>

2832. The existence of a house abutting on a highway in a dilapidated and dangerous state is a nuisance, as it is dangerous to the passers-by.<sup>3</sup> So it is a nuisance to disturb the stillness of the night by making a great noise with a speaking trumpet.<sup>4</sup> So acts indecent or immoral constitute public nuisances, as they cause annoyance to the public and are otherwise subversive of morality. So a nude exposure of one's person to the public, whether from the balcony of one's own house<sup>5</sup> or from a public place, such as a urinal,<sup>6</sup> an omnibus<sup>7</sup> or a bathing place, however ancient, by which females pass,<sup>8</sup> or the exhibition of a nude figure covered with sores as an advertisement by a herbalist,<sup>9</sup> are all instances of such a nuisance. So there can be no doubt but that the exhibition made by the beggars in the bazaar of their loathsome ailments, with a view to exciting pity is none the less a public nuisance because it is tolerated by the apathetic masses. Indeed, anything is a nuisance which annoys one whether by immoral suggestion or revolting representation, and whether it is done in a public place, or in a private place in the view of the public. The same view was taken of a booth or tent erected by the prisoners at the Epsom races to which the public were admitted on payment, who were then shown an indecent exhibition. In all such cases, both the act as well as the object were immoral. But, if the act is calculated to injure public morality, it is a nuisance, whatever may have been the object. The accused were indicted for publishing a pamphlet entitled "The Confessional Unmasked, showing the Depravity of the Romish Priesthood, the Iniquity of the Confessional and the Questions Put to Females in Confession." This pamphlet consisted of extracts from the works of theologians on the doctrines and discipline of the Church of Rome, and particularly on the practice of auricular confession. On the side of the page were printed passages in the original Latin, correctly extracted from the works of these writers, and opposite each extract was placed a free translation of it into English. Half the book dealt with controversial matters, but the remainder related to the exposition of obscene, impure and filthy acts, words and ideas of the Church of Rome. It was held that the exposure of immorality, though made with the avowed object of upholding morality, was in itself immoral and as the accused must be deemed to have intended the natural consequences of his act, he had been rightly indicted for a public nuisance.<sup>10</sup>

2833. Disposal of the Dead.—The disposal of corpses by cremation is customary now amongst high caste Hindus. It was in vogue amongst the ancient Romans, but with the advent of Christianity cremation gave place to burial as the correct method of disposing of the dead, and the right of a Christian burial became the recognized mode of the disposal of human remains, the denial of which is regarded a posthumous punishment analogous to the excommunication of the living.<sup>11</sup> In this view, law presumes that, in the case of Christians, the ordinary mode of disposal of the dead is by burial, as in the case of Hindus the presumption would be in favour of cremation. But there is nothing illegal in burning the body in the one case, or in burying it in the other, unless the burning or burying is done in a manner so as to amount to a public nuisance.<sup>1</sup> As Stephen, J., remarked: "To burn a dead body in such a place and in such a manner as to annoy persons passing along public roads or other places where they have a right to go is beyond all doubt a nuisance, as nothing more offensive both to sight or to smell can be imagined."<sup>2</sup> The question whether such an act amounts to a nuisance then depends no less upon the nature and situation of the place, as upon the manner in which it is done.

2834. But the question, whether a cremation ground constitutes a public nuisance depends upon the higher considerations of general convenience or the necessities of the whole community. And it has been accordingly held that when persons entitled to use a particular spot dedicated for the communal purpose of cremation, use it for that purpose in a manner neither unusual nor calculated to aggravate the inconveniences necessarily incident to such an act, as it is generally performed in this country, they cannot be convicted of a public nuisance on the ground that their act caused material annoyance and discomfort to persons near the place on the occasion referred to.<sup>3</sup> "To hold that an act so properly done, not only in the exercise of a right, of which the people of this country are generally so very tenacious, but also in the discharge of a serious duty, amounts, as the prosecution contends, to an offence, would be highly unreasonable and unjust. It follows, therefore, that the conviction of the accused cannot be sustained simply on the ground that their acts caused material annoyance and discomfort to the Thiruvaduthorai people, who were near the place on the occasion referred to."<sup>4</sup> The existence of a burning ghat or cremation-ground is not in itself a nuisance, if it is one set apart or so used from time immemorial, as if its use was sanctioned by the usage of the community. But, even in such a case, the fact that it is a cremation-ground does not excuse a nuisance. If it is in an offensive state or the cremation is carried on upon it in such an offensive manner as to be a source of injury, danger or annoyance to persons living in the vicinity it is a nuisance, and the Magistrate has jurisdiction to abate it under s. 133 of the Procedure Code. In such case, it is immaterial whether the cremation-ground is public or private, for, the same considerations arise in each case, and the same rules dictate the course justifiable whether the ground be public or private.

2835. It will be observed that, in order to amount to a public nuisance, when it is an encroachment on a public right, it is not necessary that any actual injury or obstruction should be caused. It is enough that the act is such as must necessarily cause injury. This difference means the difference between the offences described in ss. 283 and 290.

2836. Master Liable for Act of Servant.—The offence of public nuisance is probably an exception to the general rule which makes criminal liability dependent upon the existence of criminal intention or knowledge, the reason being that the primary object of the offence is to abate the nuisance and not to punish the wrongdoer.<sup>5</sup> If the law had made the offence dependent upon the existence of mens rea, the master might go on innocently encouraging the nuisance, though the servant directly responsible might be tried for it. It has accordingly been held that the owner of works carried on for his profit by his agents, is liable to be indicted for a public nuisance caused by the acts of his workmen in carrying on the works, though done by them without his knowledge and contrary to his general orders.<sup>6</sup> In one case, the accused was the proprietor of a slate quarry adjoining a navigable river, the refuse of which was shot into it by his workmen, contrary to his orders and without his knowledge, but with the result of obstructing its navigation. Blackburn, J., held that the questions of knowledge and authority were immaterial, and he directed the jury "that if a substantial part of the rubbish went into the river from having been improperly stacked so near the river as to fall into it, the defendant was guilty of having caused a nuisance, although the acts might have been committed by his workmen, without his knowledge and against his general orders." It was held that the direction was right.<sup>1</sup>

2837. So Littledale, J., remarked in another case that, although it may not be the defendant's object to create a nuisance, yet if it be the probable consequence of his act, he is answerable, as if it were his actual object,<sup>2</sup> and so it has been held that, if a man let land with a nuisance on it, he is responsible for the acts of his tenants.<sup>3</sup> In another case, the directors of a gas company, together with the superintendent and engineer, were indicted for a nuisance for permitting the refuse of gas to be conveyed into a public river. It was proved that the directors left the management of the works to one Leadbeter, the Superintendent, who directed the engineer, who gave orders to the rest of the workmen. The directors pleaded their ignorance in support of their innocence, but Lord Denman thus directed the jury: "It is said that the directors were ignorant of what had been done. In my judgment that makes no difference; provided you think, that they gave authority to Leadbeter to conduct the works, they will be answerable. It seems to me both common sense and law that, if persons for their own advantage employ servants to conduct works, they must be answerable for what is done by those servants."<sup>4</sup> There appears to be nothing in this chapter to make this statement inapplicable to similar cases in this country.

2838. Convenience or Advantage No Defence.—Where an act is unquestionably a nuisance, the fact that it causes some convenience or advantage is no defence. That fact is material to show that the act could not be a nuisance, because it was conducive to the convenience or advantage of a large section of the public, though, in cases affecting the public health, even the consideration of convenience may be immaterial. Of course, when once a case of nuisance is made out, the question of convenience or advantage is then no longer relevant; nor can the nuisance-feasor be heard to say that his act was reasonable and therefore could not be a nuisance.<sup>5</sup> In one case, the defendants carried on the trade of fat-melters at Southfields, and the nuisance complained of was alleged to arise from noxious gases emanating from their works. The Court found that the defendants were carrying on their trade in a reasonable manner, and took precautions to prevent it from causing a nuisance to their neighbours. Kekewich, J., held that as the defendants had taken precautions to prevent their trade from being a nuisance to their neighbours, they were from their own point of view acting reasonably. But it was no defence, for the Court was satisfied that in spite of their precautions, they were creating a nuisance.<sup>6</sup> In short, such a thing as committing a nuisance reasonably is a contradiction in terms.

and contagious diseases. It was suggested by the law Commissioners, that as "death" is defined to denote the death of a human being, life should be similarly defined, which was done.<sup>1</sup> In view of that definition the "life" spoken of in the section must be understood to refer only to human life.

2840. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

2841. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused did an act.
- (2) That he then knew or had reason to believe it to be likely to spread infection.
- (3) That such infection was of a disease dangerous to human life.
- (4) That the accused did the act unlawfully or negligently.

2842. Principle.—It is an essential rule for the preservation of society that no member thereof should jeopardize its existence by any act criminal, unlawful or negligent. Indeed, individual responsibility for its preservation is not limited by those words, but it is so limited by criminal law which enforces it within those limits by its pains and penalties. The offence extends as much to wilful acts, as to acts done heedlessly but in presence of the danger hereby threatened to society of which the accused had knowledge or belief. His responsibility will, therefore, vary with his knowledge of the infectious character of the disease. His ignorance of that fact is, then, a sufficient defence, whatever havoc his act may have played on his fellow-beings.

2843. Criminal Dissemination of Infection.—This and the next two sections are intended to avert the great danger to society from the spread of infection. The spread of infection from human intercourse cannot, of course, be altogether prevented by the measures here enacted, but they lay down the limit within which a certain course of action is compulsory, and which is consistent with the underlying principle of criminal law that no one shall be punished for what he could not avoid. Under this section, the elements of criminality are thus present (i) in the infectious nature of the disease, (ii) its knowledge or belief in the accused, and (iii) his precipitating the danger by his act at least unlawful or negligent.

2844. In the first place, then, the disease must be infectious. In the medical science diseases communicated by man to man are spoken of as being either infectious or contagious. The former are those which are communicated through the atmosphere without actual contact, the latter being those which are communicated through the medium of touch. But in either case, the communication of the disease is by contact direct or indirect, and the term "infectious" is here used as including all diseases so communicated, whether they be called infectious or contagious. There are a number of diseases upon which the medical authorities are agreed that they are infectious. There are others which are suspected to be, but have not yet been proved to be infectious. The section deals only with the former and not with the latter.

2845. Infectious diseases have been defined in the Public Health (London) Act, 1891,<sup>2</sup> to include small-pox, cholera, diphtheria, membranous croup, erysipelas the disease known as scarlatina or scarlet fever, and the fevers known by any of the following names, typhus, typhoid, enteric, relapsing, continued or puerperal. The section is confessedly inexhaustive but the diseases named may be taken to be those which are regarded as undoubtedly infectious. As regards small-pox, however, the theory of the aerial convection or dissemination of the disease has not received the unequivocal sanction of medical science.<sup>3</sup> So Fitz Gibbon, L. J., in a case<sup>4</sup> remarked: "It seems probable that the dread of small-pox is to a great extent the result of tradition. The scourge of the eighteenth century retains its terrors for those who do not realize that it has been deprived of most of its dangers. Vaccination is not only a preventive, but it also modifies the disease." But though small-pox may not have been proved to be infectious, the fact that it is so believed to be, and as such held in great terror by the people, is sufficient to render the negligent march of a person suffering from small-pox through a crowded street as public nuisance punishable, though not under this section.<sup>1</sup>

2846. In India plague,<sup>2</sup> cholera<sup>3</sup> and glanders<sup>4</sup> have been judicially held to be infectious diseases within the meaning of this section. Persons suffering from plague and cholera which have been the scourge of this country now for years, may well be presumed to know or believe that after having come in close contact with patients stricken with these diseases, they should not travel by train<sup>5</sup> or tram or hackney carts, and that if they do so they are likely to spread the infection. The accused in a case resided in a plague-stricken house in the Umballa Cantonment, and had been in contact with a plague patient. He was taken to the plague shed in company with the patient who died there. The next day, the accused left the shed against orders, and travelled by rail to the neighbouring town of Shahabad, and from thence to Karnal. He was held to have committed an offence under this section as he had sufficient reason to believe that his act was likely to spread the infection of plague, a disease dangerous to life.<sup>6</sup> The same view was taken of the accused in another case, who had removed a plague-stricken person to a house where several persons were living, one of whom caught the infection.<sup>7</sup> The case would, of course, have been different if the patient had been removed to an unoccupied house or some other means adopted to safeguard the inmates.<sup>8</sup> So where a person brought a horse infected with glanders into a public place to the danger of infecting other people, he was held to be guilty of an indictable offence.<sup>9</sup>

2847. The question whether the accused knew or believed that his act was likely to spread the infection is one of fact dependent upon many circumstances. The knowledge of the infectious character of an infectious disease would, as a matter of course, be assumed in a medical man. But it cannot be assumed in the case of any other man. For, there is no presumption that everyone knows what diseases are infectious. It is, indeed, a subject upon which, in many cases, even doctors, disagree. Take, for instance, the case of plague. Approved medical testimony is doubtful as to its infectious character. That it is contagious, admits however, of no doubt. In the decided cases the Courts do not appear to have observed any distinction between contagious and infectious diseases, and diseases that are contagious are necessarily regarded as infectious. So in Madras the accused Krishnappa was fined for travelling by train while suffering from cholera, and his companion Murugappa was similarly convicted of abetting him by purchasing his ticket and accompanying him.<sup>10</sup>

2848. In this case, the sick person by becoming a passenger in a train, at a time when he was to his knowledge suffering from cholera, did an act which he must have known was likely to spread the infection of a disease dangerous to life ; and he did so “negligently,” that is, neglecting the precautions which would have obviated risk to his fellow-passengers, in that he gave no notice of his condition to the Railway Company’s servants, who would have either provided separate accommodation for him, or have lawfully prevented him from travelling.<sup>1</sup> The question then whether an act is or is not done negligently must depend upon the nature of the act done, and the amount of care which was under the circumstances necessary. A person suffering from an infectious disease may not be negligent in taking his stroll leisurely in a lonely place. But he would be clearly negligent, if he did the same in a crowded fair. The measure of diligence necessary in such cases is then the care required to reasonably safeguard other persons from the danger of contagion. The act may be done either negligently or unlawfully. The word “unlawfully” has not been defined in the Code though the word “illegal” has been.

2849. There are, indeed, several sections of the Code in which the two terms have been used indiscriminately. An act, however, may be lawful though it may be illegal ; and an act may be “unlawful” though not illegal.<sup>2</sup> Lord Ellenborough, C. J., speaking of such offences referred to the act as done unlawfully and injuriously<sup>3</sup> which words he said precluded all legal cause or excuse.<sup>4</sup> The word unlawfully would then appear to mean inexcusably or unjustifiably, and not necessary illegally in the sense in which that term has been defined in s. 43. A person whose act unnecessarily exposes the public to the risk of contagion would be deemed to have done that act unlawfully. But the mere omission to fulfil the dictates of one’s moral duty is not unlawful. Where, therefore, the mother of a child suffering from small-pox refused to part with her child who had been ordered by the Magistrate to be removed to a hospital, was convicted under this section, the High Court in quashing the conviction observed that the accused’s act in opposing the removal could not be held to be unlawful or negligent within the meaning of this section, as indeed, “it may well be said that the carrying of a patient through a public street would be more risky to the public than keeping her in a private house.”<sup>5</sup>

2850. Syphilis and gonorrhoea are contagious diseases and a question has arisen whether a prostitute, who, while suffering from syphilis, communicates the disease to a person, who has sexual intercourse with her, can be convicted under this section “for a negligent act and one likely to spread infection of any disease dangerous to life.” In the view of West, J., she could not be convicted under this section, though she might be of cheating if the intercourse was induced by misrepresentation on the part of the diseased person. But for this, the accused’s act of sexual intercourse would not spread infection without the intervention of the complaining party, himself a responsible person, and himself generally an accomplice.<sup>6</sup> But it is submitted that there is a fallacy in this reasoning. In the first place, it is scarcely correct to describe the complainant as an accomplice. He was ex-hypothesi ignorant of the disease and the communication of the infectious disease to him did spread the infection to him within the meaning of the section. The act was, to say the least, negligent, and it, therefore, amounted to an offence under this section. Indeed, this is in accordance with the view of Lord Hale<sup>7</sup> and the case is not unlike one in which the accused, an apothecary, having inoculated children, while they were suffering from small-pox allowed them to be carried along the public street. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said that the charge laid would be made out if it was shown that what was done was, in the manner of doing it, incautious, and likely to affect the health of others.<sup>1</sup> This case is, of course, no authority for condemning inoculation altogether. It is, indeed, a useful prophylactic against certain diseases, but it must be done by a qualified man in a proper manner.<sup>2</sup> If it is done negligently, so that it has the effect contrary to what are its avowed virtues, the inoculator would be justifiably convicted under this section.<sup>3</sup>

270. Whoever maliciously does any act which is, and which he knows or has reason to believe to be, likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[ Reason to believe—s. 26      Act—ss. 32, 33.      Malignantly—s. 153 ]

2851. Analogous Law.—The offences described in this section and the last are the same, the only difference between them being that the offensive act under this section is done “malignantly”, while, under the last section, it is done merely “unlawfully or negligently.” The presence of malice then aggravates the crime for which this section prescribes the higher penalty. The distinction between an unlawful or negligent act on the one hand, and a malignant act on the other, is one which was recognized in English Law from very early times. Lord Hale puts the question whether, if a person infected with the plague should go abroad with intent to infect another, and another be thereby infected and die, it would not be murder by the Common law. And he considers it clear, that if it cannot be murder, because the intent is wanting, yet, should one be affected by the conversation of another, it would be a great misdemeanour.<sup>4</sup> It is needless to add that Lord Hale’s view has received legislative sanction in the Code.

2852. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

2853. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused did some act;
- (2) That he did it maliciously;
- (3) That his act was likely to spread a disease;
- (4) That the disease so spread was both infectious and dangerous to life;
- (5) That the accused then knew or had reason to believe his act to be likely to spread the infection of a disease dangerous to life.

2855. This section is then intended to deal with those intermediate cases in which the malignant act is not the proximate cause of death, but at the same time, it is ultimately traceable to it. The difference between the one case and the other would be one of degree and not of kind. For instance, suppose A intending to kill B conceals under his pillow a rag charged with plague bacilli, whereof B catches the infection and dies. Here, if death could be unerringly traced to the act of A, the latter would undoubtedly be held guilty of murder. Otherwise, he could only be punished under this section. The section requires that the means adopted must, not only be believed to be likely to spread infection, but it must, in fact, be capable of spreading it. If the accused wrongly believed in the potency of an act, he could not be punished for his fancy.

2856. The rest of the questions must be decided in the light of the remarks made under the last section.

271. Whoever knowingly disobeys any rule made and promulgated by the Government of India, or by any Government, for putting any vessel into a state of quarantine, or for regulating the intercourse of vessels in a state of quarantine with the shore or with other vessels, or for regulating the intercourse between places where an infectious disease prevails and other places, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

[Government of India—s. 16.]

[Any Government—s. 171.]

2857. Analogous Law.—This section deals with the disobedience of any published rule of Government whether such rule had or had not the effect of law and whether it was or was not made under any legislative enactment. As a matter of fact, Government has been empowered to frame and promulgate rules under the provisions of the Indian Ports Act,<sup>1</sup> and the Epidemic Diseases Act<sup>2</sup> the disobedience of which would be punishable under this section. But the disobedience of a lawful order passed by a public servant is not punishable under this section though it may be punishable under s. 188.

2858. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

2859. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) The existence of a rule of quarantine or for segregation;
- (2) That the rule was made by Government;
- (3) That it had promulgated it;
- (4) That the accused knew of the rule;
- (5) That he disobeyed it;
- (6) That he did so knowingly.

2860. Disobedience of Preventive Rules.—The disobedience of a lawful order passed by a public servant is punishable under s. 188, which, however, does not include Government, obedience to which orders has been otherwise insured. This section is an example of one such provision. It relates only to a knowing disobedience of its rules, which must, however, be legal, but which must, having regard to the language of the section, be presumed.<sup>3</sup> These rules must, so far as this section is concerned, relate to (a) quarantine; or (b) regulating the intercourse between places where an infectious disease prevails and other places, or in short, segregation. The rules must be made by the Government of India or any Government. Rules made under the authority of such Government may be otherwise enforceable, but they are not subject to the coercion of this section. As the words “Government of India” and “Government” in this connexion mean the imperial and local Governments of British India, rules made by any other State are not enforceable under this section. But the rules made and promulgated by the Government of this country would be binding on ships of whatever nationality, so long as they are

(1) The Indian Ports Act (III of 1901).
 (2) Act III of 1897, s. 2.
 (3) Cf. s. 188, where the words “lawfully empowered, etc.,” make proof of legality incumbent on the prosecution.

within the territorial jurisdiction of that Government (§§ 71-72). Once they are outside that jurisdiction, the rules remain but the power to enforce them is gone. But, apart from this section, the rules of quarantine have now an established place in the criminal Codes of all civilized countries, and masters of ships touching their ports do so on condition that they obey them (§ 41). In fact, the rules being made as much for the safety of the vessels concerned as of those holding communication with them, it is the mutual interest of both parties to obey them, and their disobedience is punishable, whoever is guilty of infringing the rules regulating the intercourse of such vessels.

2861. The knowledge required to convert a disobedience of the rules into an offence under this section may be gained in a variety of ways. All ships in quarantine are required to hoist a yellow flag when approaching a harbour or at anchor and persons who communicate with them must be presumed to have knowledge of that fact.

2862. The case of segregation of infected place from another is different. Here the Government publishes the regulation in the official gazette, but such publication cannot be taken to be a notice to all the world. It will be observed that the only rules here contemplated are for regulating the intercourse between infected and non-infected places. No rule can, therefore, be made to regulate the intercourse between two places both infected or non-infected.

2863. Where the rule is clear and disobedience wilful, the question of motive or intention or injurious consequence is immaterial. The Government is the best judge of the propriety and wisdom of the rules and he who disobeys them is liable, whatever may have been his individual feeling on the subject.

272. Whoever adulterates any article of food or drink so as to make such article noxious as food or drink, intending to sell such articles as food or drink, or knowing it to be likely that the same will be sold as food or drink, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Adulteration of food or drink intended for sale.

2864. Analogous Law.—This section<sup>1</sup> is not the only provision penalizing the sale and exposure for sale of adulterated articles of food or drink; for, the various Municipal Acts contain several other provisions for seizure and destruction of noxious articles, and in the case of meat, a previous examination of the animals for slaughter is a part of a bye-law of most municipalities. This section however, is not confined to food and drink intended only for human consumption. The purveyor of noxious food for cattle is equally liable to punishment under this section, while cl. 5 of s. 521 of the Code of Criminal Procedure authorizes the Court to order destruction of the food or drink in respect of which the conviction is had.

2865. Procedure and Practice.—This section is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

2866. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the accused adulterated.
- (2) That the thing adulterated was an article of food or drink.
- (3) That the adulteration made is noxious as food or drink.
- (4) That the accused adulterated it intending to sell it, or knowing it to be likely that it will be sold as food or drink.

(1) As was to be expected, the provisions of this and the next section are in accordance with the English Common Law; Stevenson, 3 F. & F. 106; Jarvis, 3 F. & F. 108.

2867. Sale of Noxious Food.—This section is directed only against the adulteration of an article of food or drink which renders it noxious for consumption. The word “noxious” means injurious to health, and not repugnant to one’s feeling.<sup>1</sup> Mere adulteration with harmless ingredients for the purpose of getting more profit is not punishable under this section. For example, the mixing of water with milk is adulteration, but it is not noxious,<sup>2</sup> so that such adulteration is not punishable under this section, nor is it an offence to sell inferior food though it is not adulterated but is still noxious, the seller being thus punishable under the provisions of the next section. So, though the mixing of pig’s fat with ghee and sale of the mixture would be regarded as noxious to the religious and social feeling of Hindus and Mahomedans, yet it is not noxious to health, against which alone this section is directed.<sup>3</sup>

2868. The provisions of this section are in accordance with English Law, under which a person is indictable at common law for publicly exposing or causing to be exposed for sale in a market, meat unfit for human consumption.<sup>4</sup> But a person there is not indictable at common law for sending such meat to a salesman in a market, unless he intended it to be sold for human food.<sup>5</sup> As the section is worded, such a person would be obviously liable in this country.

273. Whoever sells, or offers or exposes for sale, as food or drink, any article which has been rendered or has become noxious, or is in a state unfit for food or drink, knowing or having reason to believe that the same is noxious as food or drink, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Sale of noxious food or drink.

2869. Analogous Law.—This section is a necessary adjunct of the last and provides against the sale or exposure for sale of an article unfit for human consumption. Its terms are necessarily wider, for it comprises not only articles adulterated, but also those rendered noxious by lapse of time as tinned provisions kept too long, or those rendered unfit for consumption by long exposure, neglect or contamination.

2870. Procedure and Practice.—This section is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily. Under section 521, cl. 3 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Court may, on conviction of the accused, order that the article of food or drink, in respect of which the conviction was had, be destroyed. The Procedure Code does not justify a general order given by a Magistrate to his orderly to produce before him all persons found selling fruit unfit for human consumption. The delegation of such magisterial discretion to the orderly peon can never be legal; and an orderly compelling the sellers of fruit to accompany him to the Magistrate cannot complain of resistance, though such resistance could not be justified except under s. 99.<sup>6</sup>

- (1) That the accused sold or offered or exposed for sale.
- (2) That the thing so sold, offered or exposed was an article of food or drink.
- (3) That the said article had been rendered noxious, or was in a state unfit for food or drink ;
- (4) That the accused then knew or had reason to believe that the same was noxious or unfit for food or drink.

2872. Sale of Unfit Food or Drink.—This section is important and deals with an evil which requires to be rigorously repressed.

(i) Sale must be as Food or Drink.

The offence here described deals with an article of food or drink, which includes a drug or a medical preparation. The last section deals with the adulteration of such articles so as to render them noxious. This section deals, not only with the articles so adulterated, but also with those which have been otherwise rendered noxious or unfit for human consumption. As the section is worded, it is clear that the article sold must be "as food or drink." The sale of a noxious article which is not itself usable as food or drink is, therefore, no offence under this section. So in an English case decided under the analogous provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875,<sup>1</sup> it was held that the sale of a packet of baking powder which contained 20 per cent. of bicarbonate of soda, 40 per cent. of ground rice and 40 per cent. of alum—an article which is injurious to health was not punishable, as it was not by itself an article of food. As Hawkins, J., remarked: "The mere sale of an article, not itself an article of food, even though it be sold with the knowledge of the vendor that, if it is the buyer's intention to mix it with the ingredients of which an article of food, e. g., bread, is to be composed, is no offence under s. 3, and it makes no difference in a legal point of view that, when sold, it is mixed with other ingredients, not in themselves hurtful, some or one of which might, in an unmixed state, be used as articles or an article of food, if the injurious and harmless ingredients are so inseparably mixed and in such quantities that the mixture, as a whole, forms an injurious compound, which nobody would dream of using as food."<sup>2</sup> Of course, this does not mean that nothing that is not made up into an eatable and drinkable form and fit for immediate use can be deemed to be an article of food. For example, flour, butter salt, mustard, pepper and the like, are all articles of food, though no one would ordinarily dream of using them alone, but being articles intended to form substantial components of articles of food, or to be eaten as adjuncts thereto, they are themselves regarded as articles of food.

2873. The true test whether an article is an article of food is, then, whether it is a substantial and requisite material for making food.<sup>3</sup> But is grain an article of food? It is a substantial and requisite material for making bread, and if this test be applied it is certainly an article of food within the meaning of this section. But Banerji, J., held otherwise in a case in which, as a matter of trade, the owner of a grain pit had sold its contents, before it was opened, with all faults at a certain sum per maund and on the pit being opened it was found that a large proportion of the grain was found to be unfit for human consumption, whereupon the seller was convicted under this section, but his conviction was quashed on revision, the Court holding that the sale of grain was not sale of an article as food or drink.<sup>4</sup> But the learned Judge might have supported his finding on the unquestionable ground that the seller having sold the closed pit could not be said to have known or believed that the grain underneath was unfit for human consumption.

2874. Again, the article of food or drink must, according to the section, be sold or offered or exposed for sale. If it is served at dinner for which no price is charged there is no offence. The pledge of an article of food, such as rice, which may result in its sale, is not sale, nor an offer of a sale, so long as it remains a pledge. A person who sends unsound meat to a salesman for sale "offers" it for sale within the meaning of this section. In this respect this section

(2) There must be Exposure, Offer or Sale.

(1) 38 & 39 Vict., c. 63, s. 3 of which runs thus: "No person shall mix any article of food with any ingredient or material so as to render the article injurious to health with intent that the same may be sold in that state, and no person shall sell any such article so mixed under a penalty."

is an improvement on the English Law under the similar provisions of which<sup>1</sup> it was held by Day, J., that where the accused, a farmer in the country, sent to a salesman in London meat, which he knew to be unfit for human consumption, and the latter merely held it in deposit in his shop but did not expose it for sale and informed the Inspector of its condition, the accused could not be convicted, as the Statute only referred to exposure for sale, and did not extend to a deposit in the shop. The learned Judge, however, regretted that a person in the country who knowingly sent unsound meat up to a London market should escape punishment, because there has not technically been an exposure for sale.<sup>2</sup> But where a butcher, intending to sell mutton, killed and hung up a sheep in the slaughter-house where it was condemned, he could not be convicted of this offence as he had neither offered nor exposed it for sale.<sup>3</sup>

2875. Thirdly, the article of food or drink must be noxious or unfit for consumption whether of man or of the lower animals, for the section does not limit its operation only to man.<sup>4</sup> The article must be noxious or unfit as food or drink for which it was sold. Its noxiousness or unfitness may be brought about by any cause whatever, but it must be noxious or unfit. Now what do these words mean? The word "noxious" means injurious to health. Anything unwholesome as food is noxious to health. The word "unfit" is of larger conception. But it does not merely mean unsuitable for food or drink, on account of its inferior quality brought about by harmless admixture or adulteration. For instance, the admixture of a large quantity of dirt, wood, matches, charcoal and black seeds in wheat offered for sale does not make the wheat unfit for consumption within the meaning of this section.<sup>5</sup> The seller of such stuff may be dealt with under the various municipal laws and bye-laws and it may even amount to cheating;<sup>6</sup> but the section is intended to strike at a different evil. It does not apply to the sale of merely inferior articles, but of articles which have become so unfit for consumption that they can be no longer made fit for that purpose.

2876. Lastly, the accused must have sold the article knowing or having reason to believe that the same was, or had been rendered noxious or unfit for human consumption at the time it was sold. The section says nothing about the knowledge of the purchaser, the offence consisting in the sale of an unwholesome article of food, and not on the ignorance of its condition by the purchaser. So Parke, B., said: "Victuallers, butchers, and other common dealers in victuals, are not merely in the same situation that common dealers in other commodities are, and liable under the same circumstances that they are, so that if an order be sent to them to be executed, they are presumed to undertake to supply a good and merchantable article; but they are also liable to punishment for selling corrupt victuals, by virtue of an ancient Statute,<sup>7</sup> certainly if they do so knowingly, and probably, if they do not."<sup>8</sup>

2877. The sale of unwholesome food is reprobated not because it may be an imposition on the purchaser, if it is punishable otherwise as cheating, but because the sale of noxious food is injurious to the public health. If, therefore, the vendor sells noxious food to the purchaser and apprises him of the fact, he is none the less guilty because law would not permit a man to poison himself by noxious food and to this extent it helps him against himself. But the question of notice is material as it may, then, be urged that the purchaser with notice could not have purchased it as food or drink. So where the accused sold a quantity of old and gritty flour, unfit for human consumption, at the reduced rate of 18 seers per rupee, which was 3 seers more than the prevailing market-rate, and the seller told the purchaser that the flour was bad and was, therefore, sold cheap, he was held to have committed no offence under this section.<sup>1</sup> In such a case, the accused might well have believed that the purchaser was not likely to use the flour as food on account of its inferior quality.

2878. The knowledge or belief may be inferred from the condition of the food, the probability of its having become noxious, the foul smell it has begun to emit, or its altered appearance. In order to be punishable it is not necessary to show that the article had become unfit owing to anything done by the vendor, for it may have become so by natural deterioration. So a vendor was convicted for selling toddy in which worms had germinated owing to its having been kept too long.<sup>2</sup> But where the accused had sold some ghee which, on chemical analysis, was pronounced to be "somewhat rancid," the accused's conviction was quashed on the ground that there was no evidence that the accused knew it to be noxious at the time. The principle deducible from this case, then, is this, that merely expert evidence is not sufficient to bring the offence home to the accused. There must be such evidence from which the Court would be justified in inferring that the accused knew it to be noxious at the time of sale.<sup>3</sup>

2879. Master Liable for Act of Servant.—Under the English Statute<sup>4</sup> and common law<sup>5</sup> the master is criminally liable for the act of his servant, and the husband for the act of his wife,<sup>6</sup> if the master or husband knew that the article offered for sale was noxious and the sale was made by the servant in the course of his employment. In such a case, the sale by the servant is really a sale by the master. Qui facit per alium, facit per se.<sup>7</sup> But in this, as in the other case of direct dealing with the customer, the proof of knowledge or belief is essential.<sup>8</sup>

274. Whoever adulterates any drug or medical preparation in such a manner as to lessen the efficacy or change the operation of such drug or medical preparation, or to make it noxious, intending that it shall be sold or used for, or knowing it to be likely that it will be sold or used for, any medicinal purpose, as if it had not undergone such adulteration, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

2880. Analogous Law.—This section is even wider in its terms than the last section dealing only with victuals. As the purity of drugs is a sine qua non for their efficacy and as tampering with drugs may have serious consequence upon those to whom it is administered, it is a matter of public concern that the purity and efficacy of drugs should be insured by the imposition of condign penalty.

2881. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily. Besides inflicting the punishment authorized by the section, the Court is empowered to order destruction of the drug or medical preparation in respect of which the conviction was had.<sup>9</sup>

- (1) That the article in question is a drug or a medical preparation ;
- (2) That the accused adulterated it ;
- (3) That he then intended or knew it likely :—
  - (a) that it will be sold or used for any medicinal purpose ; and
  - (b) that it will be so used as if it were unadulterated.
- (4) That the adulteration—
  - (a) lessened the efficacy ;
  - (b) changed the operation of the drug or medicine ;
  - (c) made it noxious.

2883. Principle.—It is the duty of the State to conserve the health of its people. The purity of food and drink and of the atmosphere, and the existence of sanitary surroundings are some of the essentials, for warding off the existence of disease ; when it comes the purity of the drugs administered is essential to arrest its ravages. The preceding sections are intended to provide against the contamination of food, drink and air while this section is intended to insure speedy cure in case of illness. The section is, however, salutary but not drastic in this respect. It punishes fraudulent adulteration of drugs but not the purveying of drugs of inferior quality. To do so would shut many people off from the advantage of procuring cheap drugs, and it may then frustrate the very object the section has in view.

2884. Fraudulent Adulteration of Drugs.—This section punishes the intentional adulteration of drugs and medical preparations. It only punishes the adulteration which is a fraud on those who may have to use it. The section, therefore, adds that the intention or knowledge should be that it will be or was likely to be used for any medical purpose as if it had not undergone such adulteration. The adulteration of drugs for medical purposes is sometimes necessary, but in certain cases the sale of adulterated drugs is prohibited. The section does not deal with offences like these. It only deals with cases in which adulterated medicines are sold as unadulterated. The punishment is, again, reserved for the person actually adulterating them. Others adulterating at his instigation or with his knowledge or connivance may be similarly dealt with, the instigator being then liable for abetment.

2885. The question whether any act constitutes adulteration, must be judged by the test appointed by the section, namely, did it have the effect of lessening its efficacy, or had it changed its operation. In some cases, the lessening of efficacy may have a beneficial effect upon the patient to whom the drug is administered but it is the business of the physician to see to. The purveyor of drugs must sell them pure and unadulterated—not as pure as they can be made, but pure enough to be marketable. The chemist may mix, say, cod-liver oil of inferior quality with the oil of superior quality and sell the oil so adulterated, as pure cod-liver oil. Its efficacy is lessened, but the oil has not been adulterated in the sense in which the term has been used in this section. The word is probably intended to suggest the admixture of a substance in the drug, which greatly diminishes its known efficacy, so that it fails of its effect. The change of the operation of a drug may be similarly brought about by adulteration. But if the change is beneficial it is an improvement and not an adulteration. Take for instance, the case of tasteless quinine or smell-less iodine. The pure substance in each case has been subjected to chemical treatment, but it has not materially changed its operation or diminished its efficacy. The offence, here, really consists in the fraud or deception practised on the public by selling them as pure, something which is impure, for which the public would not have paid the same price, if they had been made aware of its inferior quality. Knowledge or belief in its intended use as medicine confines the offence within its proper limits ; but otherwise the offence is only a part of the wider subject in which fraud and deception are always actionable, and when they assume a more serious form, they become indictable.

275. Whoever knowing any drug or medical preparation to have been adulterated, in such a manner as to lessen its efficacy, to change its operation, or to render it noxious, sells the same, or offers or exposes it for sale, or issues it from any dispensary for medicinal purposes as unadulterated, or causes it to be used for medicinal purposes by any person not knowing of the adulteration, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

2886. Analogous Law.—This section bears the same analogy to the last as its predecessor bears to s. 272. That section (s. 273) and the last punish the adulterators, and thus punish the purveyor of such goods. There is, however, this difference between s. 273 and this, that while the former only punishes a sale of noxious food or drink, this section punishes both the sale as well as its issue from any dispensary for medical purposes as unadulterated. This was, of course, necessary, for dispensaries are paid for the medicine they issue, and, the fact the price was not set upon the drug sold could be no defence to dispensing it in an adulterated form. The last section and this correspond with section 49 of the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act<sup>1</sup> the provisions of which are similar to those here enacted.

2887. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, and summons must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but non-compoundable, and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily. On a conviction under this section the Court is further empowered by section 521 (1) of the Procedure Code to order the destruction of the drug or medical preparation in respect of which the conviction was had.

2888. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

- (1) That the article in question was a drug or medical preparation.
- (2) That it had been adulterated in such a manner as to—
  - (a) lessen its efficacy; or
  - (b) change its operation; or
  - (c) to render it noxious.
- (3) That the accused—
  - (a) sold it; or
  - (d) offered it for sale; or
  - (c) exposed it for sale; or
  - (d) issued it from any dispensary; or
  - (e) caused it to be issued.
- (4) That he sold or issued it as unadulterated, or caused it to be so issued by a person not knowing of its adulteration.
- (5) That the accused then knew that it was adulterated with the effect mentioned in (2).

2889. Principle.—This section lays down, in small compass a rule which has been dealt with, with great elaboration in English Law and the English Statute.<sup>2</sup> But the object, in each case, was the same, viz., to prevent the issue and sale of adulterated or noxious drugs, and in this respect neither the English Statute nor this section makes any distinction between master and servant, principal or agent, between one who himself dispenses, and one who employs a compounder to do it for him. In England, the sale of drugs by unqualified persons is strictly prohibited. In this country there is no such restriction and it consequently abounds with quacks and charlatans who impose on the gullible public their drugs and medicines of resounding names and reputation for efficacy. It may be difficult to apply the section to them, but there is no reason why it should not be so applied. Besides these, there are those who set themselves up as chemists or druggists or pharmacists who profess to sell pure drugs and medicinal preparations of known make or composition. The section will easily apply to such persons dispensing adulterated preparations. The object of the section is, of course, to protect the public health by penalizing the sale and issue of adulterated inefficacious and noxious drugs. But the enforcement of the section requires further provisions like those of the English Statutes, otherwise it is likely to remain a dead letter.

(1) 31 & 32 Vict., c. 121, ss. 4-9, cited in (2) 31 & 32 Vict., c. 121.
 1 Penal Law (4th Ed.) pp. 1376, 1377.

2890. Sale of Adulterated Drugs.—It is necessary to clearly grasp the meaning of the terms “drug or medical preparation.” There are a large number of articles which are put to this use but which cannot be so described. There are others which the native Hakim uses as drugs, but which are not in the British pharmacopœia. The article in question must be a recognised drug or a medical preparation of fixed consistency, otherwise, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to put the last two sections in practice. For instance, that native Hakim prescribes the use of kerosine oil as an embrocation for muscular rheumatism. But it is not a drug or a medicinal preparation. It is an article of household necessity. The words “drugs and medical preparations” must be understood to mean only such articles as are primarily used for medical purposes. Other articles may possess medicinal virtue, but they do not thereby assume that character. In order to determine whether an article is a drug or a medicinal preparation, the test to apply is: was it its ordinary and normal use or was it only its secondary use. The term “drug” is defined in the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act to include medicine for internal or external use.<sup>1</sup>

2891. The term adulteration has already been the subject of some comment. It is here used in the same large sense in which it is used in English Law. Its description in the English “Sale of Food and Drugs Act” is probably as complete a definition as is possible. The term includes not only an admixture of foreign matter or substance but also an alteration of the composition of the drug by extracting therefrom any of its vital constituents. The extraction of starch from wheat or cream from milk would be an adulteration. So in the case of drugs where the composition of a certain article is prescribed by the British pharmacopœia, it will be presumed that the article sold is of the standard quality as there prescribed. For example, the “tincture of opium” is one such article, and a well understood term in the trade, and its sale implies a guarantee that its ingredients are as given in the British Pharmacopœia. Where, therefore, the “tincture of opium” sold by the accused was deficient in opium to the extent of one-third, and in alcohol to the extent of nearly one-half as compared with the standard prescribed by the British Pharmacopœia, the accused was convicted under section 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (§ 2886), although the purchaser had not specially asked for tincture of opium prepared according to the recipe in the British Pharmacopœia.<sup>2</sup> The same view was taken in another case where the “mercury ointment” sold by the accused did not contain the requisite proportion of mercury, as prescribed by the British Pharmacopœia.<sup>3</sup>

2892. The enforcement of the section in the case of drugs, mentioned in the British Pharmacopœia, is thus likely to present no difficulty. For the British Pharmacopœia supplies a fixed and certain standard which is as much a guide to the pharmacist as to those who have to enforce its standard in the preparation of drugs and medicines. But the same invariable standard is wanting in the case of other drugs, and it may, then, be a question whether an article sold is of the requisite quality or not. In such case, there being no standard there can be no test, and until a standard is fixed, the section is likely to remain a dead letter.

2893. Of course, even where the other elements of criminality are present, no one can be convicted of this offence, unless he “sells, offers, or exposes for sale” an adulterated drug in his possession. If he is merely in possession of such a drug he cannot be convicted. So where the accused a grocer was found to possess in his cellar a quantity of unlabelled margarine, the exposure of which for sale without a printed label is an offence,<sup>1</sup> he was held to have committed no offence as the words "exposed for sale" were held to mean exposed to view in the shop in the sight of the purchaser.<sup>2</sup> But as was explained by Lawrence, J., in a subsequent case, the word "exposure" does not mean that the article itself should be exposed to view. It is sufficient exposure of the article, if the packet containing it is exhibited in the shop for sale.<sup>3</sup> The addition of the words "offers it for sale" enlarge the terms of the section, but an offer implies a proposal, which cannot be presumed from the mere fact of deposit in the shop.

2894. In an English case, decided upon the Statute in which the words "offer for sale" do not occur, the words "whoever sells" have been held to include he who sells, whether he be a master or servant, principal or a person to whom the conduct and management of sales is delegated.<sup>4</sup> But a mere canvasser who gets commission for receiving orders, is excluded as not being a seller.<sup>5</sup> And the question may arise whether a canvasser, though not a seller, does not "offer for sale" within the meaning of this section. The only reason why he should not be so regarded is that he is a mere intermediary, bringing the seller and buyer together, and that he does not really offer for sale, but communicates the seller's offer to intending purchasers. He cannot, therefore, be regarded as "offering for sale" so as to be liable under the section.

276. Whoever knowingly sells, or offers or exposes for sale, or issues from dispensary for medicinal purposes any drug or medical preparation, as a different drug or medical preparation, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Sale of drug as a different drug or preparation.

2895. Analogous Law.—The section is held to be covered by the provisions of section 6 of the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.<sup>6</sup> For an article which is not of the nature, substance and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser may be as much the same article of inferior quality as it may be a different article altogether.<sup>7</sup> Such would be the case where lard is supplied for butter, chicory for tea, or savin for saffron.<sup>8</sup> The section deals specifically only with medical preparations, the case of food and drink would have probably to be dealt with under section 290.

2896. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

2897. Proof.—The points requiring proof are :—

- (1) That the accused sold or offered or exposed for sale, or issued from dispensary;
- (2) That the article so sold, etc., was a drug or medical preparation;
- (3) That the accused sold, etc., a drug which was different from what it was professed to be;
- (4) That he knew of such difference at the time it was so sold, etc.

2898. Principle.—This is only a continuation of the offence described in the last section. All the elements of criminality in the two cases are the same, the only difference between them consisting in the sale being not of the same article as required but of one different. This latter may or may not be a good substitute
